THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

George R. Graham & Co. Publishers.

S. W. CORNER OF THIRD AND CHESNUT STREETS.

Terms. Two Dollars Per Annum, Cash.

THREE DOLLARS IF NOT PAID IN ADVANCE

A Family Newspaper: Neutral in Politics: Devoted to News, Literature, Science, Morality, Agriculture, and Amusement.

VOLUME XXII. PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 19, 1842. WHOLE NO. 1073.

Original Poetry.

Written for the Saturday Evening Post.

Lines.

BY EDWARD YOUNG.

Let those who will repine at fate
And droop their heads with sorrow,
Though when cares upon me wait,—
I know they'll leave to morrow.
My purse is light, but what of that?
My heart is light to match it
And if I tear my only coat,
I laugh the while I patch it.

I've seen some elves, who called themselves
My friends, in summer weather;
Blown far away in sorrow's day,
As winds would blow a feather,
I never proved to these them go
(The rascals, who would heed 'em)
For what's the use of having friends,
If false when most you need 'em.

I've seen some, rich in worldly gear,
Eternally repining
Their hearts a prey to every fear,
With gladness never shining.
I would not change my lightsome heart,
For all their gold and sorrow;
For that's a thing that all their wealth,
Can neither lay nor borrow.

And still when sorrows come to me,
(As sorrows sometimes will come)
I find the way to make them flee,
By bidding them right welcome.
They cannot break a cheerful look
They're used to sober and sighing
And he that meets them with a smile,
Is sure to see them flying

Southport, W. T. 1841

Written for the Saturday Evening Post

Simon.

BY MARTIN THAYER, JR.

They tell me that you smile too oft
Upon my lone and weary way,
That gentle words, and glances soft,
Too frequent grace, are thrown away;
They say that frowns should sometimes cloud
The face where love and kindness reign,
That pride and scorn should sometimes shroud
The heart that ne'er hath given pain.

That lover's looks like shore should change,
Now clothed in light, now robed in storm;
What glances cold, and actions strange
Should vex and wring the heart forlorn;
Ah! little do rude wise understand
That love ne'er dies fair blossom'd seem,
That where one heart hath stored its wealth
There is no pride or love of self.

That lovers' looks would scorn to feign
Feelings that would true love shame,
That love can dwell and reign yet
Dwell not in the hollow heart;
That love's serene and holy light
Is not the contour of a night,
But steal's its constant light afar,
In life's wide heaven as the sweetest star!

Original Tales.

Written for the Saturday Evening Post

Off Cape Horn.

BY HARRY DANSFORTH, AUTHOR OF "CRUISING IN THE LAST WAR," &c., &c.

"Story! Lord bless you I have none to tell, sir."
Knife Grinder.

"Have you ever rounded Cape Horn?" said the lieutenant, as he cut a slice from the beef and nodded for me to push the punch—"that's what I call being at sea. Your long-shore skippers who have never seen the outside of the Sound, ought to be pitched about in a hurricane off the Horn for the matter of a month or so—I fancy it would take the edge off of their boasting. Why, when I was in the Olympus" and here he was seized with a violent hiccup, "we were fifty-nine days in attempting to come round from the Pacific, and three several times we saw the waves breaking on the Cape—but no sooner were we up to the infernal old rock, than a storm of wind and sleet would come whistling around the promontory, pinning the men down to the yards when they went adrift to shorten sail, and sweeping us, like a chip in a mill race, dead to leeward. We stuck it out, for nearly two months, and then—confound this tough beef—had to pull up stakes and return home by the way of New Holland and the Cape of Good Hope after all. Heaven defend me from Cape Horn!"

"Yes!—I once rounded the Horn," was my reply, "but it must have been in an unusually calm season. Nevertheless, I came near losing my life thereby."

"How was that?—eh!" said the lieutenant.

"In a long story, and as the punch is rather lively perhaps the tale would be tedious."

"Not a bit of it, my boy," said the lieutenant, touching his glass to mine and winking "out with it, Harry, my old cove," and he slapped me familiarly on the back.

"The story! the story!" echoed the whole table; and I was forced to begin.

"You must know then," I said, leaning my arms on the table and looking slowly around the group, while the lieutenant gravely filled my glass and then stared silently into my face, "you must know then, that in the last war, and before Porter thought of carrying the Essex around the Horn, I was a sort of reefer on board a smart privateer, commanded by my uncle, as bold an old sailor as ever sailed salt-water, God bless him!"

"Ah! God bless him," echoed the lieutenant, nodding and putting down his glass.

"We had been cruizing in the Pacific," I continued, "with some success, and were about returning home, when, one morning, we were chased by an English man-of-war; but, owing to our superior speed, and assisted by a squall of hail which shut us in from sight, we escaped. It kept us three days after the blow had subsided, to recover our ground; but this we did not mind, since it rid us of the enemy, for none of us had any fancy for Dartmoor prison, or the English hulks.

"I was standing, the morning after we got sight of the Cape again, talking to my uncle by the weather rail-ing. The night before, the sky had been as clear as a kitten's eye, and I had amused myself with watching the gigantic billows break on the promontory, flinging their foam often as high as the top of a first-rater. Now, however, the scene was changed. The morning was just breaking, and all was dim. There was no longer the magnificent horizon, stretching in awful grandeur around us, but the morning mists curtained all from our sight, and we could see nothing but the waves, whitening on our quarter, and the spray driving into the thick darkness ahead. The long had labored so uneasily in the night that she had been put before the wind, and was now scudding along with the tempest. Aloft, nothing but a close-reefed foresail was seen, straining in the gale that rattled through the rigging. The tall, trim, bare masts lashed gallantly against the sky. The darkness, the uncertainty, and, most of all, the anxious look on my uncle's face, stirred a new and strange feeling within me—it was something akin to fear.

"'A sail!' suddenly sung the look-out at the main-top.

"'A sail!' came hoarsely sweeping from the forecastle.

"'Where away?' asked the captain, glancing hastily around.

"'Close on the'

"'Heavens! it's the Englishman!' ejaculated the captain, drowning the look-out's cry. 'How she staggers on us—she'll run us down, by Jove!'

"I looked to windward, and, sure enough, there was our old enemy, from whom, but four days since, we had escaped, careering almost in our wake. She was an English frigate of the largest class, and, with a press of canvass on her that made every thing crack again, was dashing rapidly out of the morning fog. At first, only her tall masts were seen above the thick mists; then her yard-arms rolled into the clear space, and at last, her dark, trim, jaunty hull shot out of the fog, until the enormous mass, driving along with a cloud of foam, had come so near that I could with ease have flung a biscuit on her decks.

"The frigate had seen us almost as soon as we had detected her. Her commander determined, at once, to avail himself of his favorable position. The heavy press of canvass on the frigate—for she carried a reefed foresail and a close-reefed main course—was driving her along with a velocity that would soon bring her up with us; and even before the first moment of surprise had passed away, she could be seen sweeping down close on our starboard quarter, her enormous bow far overtopping our more humble stern. I could already, as I have said, have pitched a biscuit on her decks, when my uncle ordered me forward to be prepared in case he should wish to set the fore-stay-sail. I had just reached the cat-head when the frigate hailed.

"'Heave to!' again came, in the stirring tones of the trumpet, down the wind.

"Old Townsend muttered not a word. He stood in the main-rigging, still and motionless, grasping his trumpet with the clutch of a Hercules, and eyeing his enemy like a hawk, as, bent on her dreadful purpose, she came rushing down, leviathan like, upon us. Not a breath was drawn on board either ship. Our oldest sailors grasped the rigging, in momentary expectation of the approaching wreck, while every eye was fastened on the dark hull of the foe. Her lofty bow was already up to our very quarter, her giant yards nearly interlocked with our own as she rolled—a second of awful suspense ensued, and just as a practised eye might have seen the extremity of her gib-boom receive a hair's-breadth towards us, old Townsend, without taking his eye from her hull, waved his trumpet, and shouted, in a voice of thunder—

"'Starboard—hard—down!'

"'Starboard, quarter-master, h-a-r-d!' rung out from the frigate, and the enormous mass, swinging rapidly around, came bearing down on our bow.

"The captain had seen our only chance. The frigate was already so close on to us when she was discovered, and her course had been maintained so steadily since, that we had no doubt of her intention to run us down; but my uncle, ever fertile in manœuvres, had nicely calculated the chances and determined to keep on his course until the very moment of collision, when he would close-haul the little brig on the larboard tack, and thus get to windward of the foe. He calculated the more certainly on the ruse because the frigate was of an unusually sharp mould, and he thought that her commander would be unwilling to run the risk of having a sea pitched into his waist in wearing—and so for himself, my uncle would as leave have sunk every soul of us as have surrendered to the foe. The plan was well conceived, but the daring and rapidity with which the frigate jammed her helm to starboard, disappointed our calculations. She came around after us with a sullen surge, crashing right across our bowsprit and carrying away the jib-boom. But of this I knew nothing at the time, for, as she swung on her heel, one of her spars—I know not how—his one and knocked me like a foot-ball into fathom

"When I rose to the surface, the first thing I did was to strike out for my life. Happily a spar floated by me, and eagerly grasping it, I felt myself for the time secure. Shaking the spray from my face, I looked around for our brig, and to my surprise beheld her bowsing to windward, and seemingly uninjured except in her rigging. She was rapidly, however, falling away into the mist, and I began, with a fearful feeling, to think of myself. In the hurry and confusion which I knew must result I had little chance of being missed, and I was now floating on the ocean with nothing but a frail spar for my support. The velocity with which I was urged through the water surprised me, but another wave at this moment dashed over me, and I rose again, drenched, to the surface. Shaking the spray off, I looked up and saw that I had grasped what was apparently a broken spar from the frigate, to which, by its hamper, it was still attached. The hope which had died in my breast revived, and I shouted aloud. But all this had not occupied a minute.

"'Keep her to it, quarter-master; we can do nothing with the Yankee in such a gale, and our foretopsail-yard gone,' shouted the officer of the deck—they must have snapped the spar in wearing. 'Away, there,' he sang out to a louder tone, 'hurry up that spar!' and then came the quick hurrying of feet on the deck over head.

"I was hurried along, buried in the foam, and dragged with my spar almost under the vast hull of the frigate. Consequently, I was not discernable from the deck. I saw this, and shouted again, for it was my only hope. They did not hear me. I could feel that the cordage which kept my spar to the frigate was slowly loosening, and at every surge I fell farther towards her stern. I renewed my shouts in a voice of alarm.

"'Cut away that hamper!' thundered, angrily, the officer of the deck.

"'Oh! my God!' I exclaimed, in frightful desperation, 'cut me not loose—billoo!'

"My impotent cries were echoed from the overhanging side of the frigate, or lost in the loud roarings of the gale, and in an instant with a quick jerk, I was cast loose, a wave surged over me, and when again I rose to the surface, I was far astern of the now rapidly receding man-of-war. I shouted again; but it was in vain. The roaring of the waters drowned my feeble voice.

"I renewed again and again, with more despairing feelings, my efforts; but all was useless. Before a quarter of an hour, the frigate was well down to leeward, carrying a press of sail, and swinging her tall masts, as she rolled towards the water.

"Meanwhile, with a feeling which none but those who have been in such a situation can imagine, I clung to my spar, and was borne onward with the enormous billows. Every instant a wave washed over me, drenching me with its cold spray, and shaking me almost loose from my support. Now I rose toward the clouds on the breast of some gigantic billow, and then, with its crest combing over me, I was hurried, with frightful velocity, into the abyss below. Tossed, drenched, cold, wearied, I had neither hope nor plan. When I rose to the top of the long wave I would look eagerly around me, but the same desolate scene on all hands met my eye. The morning mists had cleared away, but it was only to disclose in more terrific grandeur the vast prospect that stretched around. The intensity of the hurricane had levelled the waves, and wrapped the ocean in a cloud of driving spray, which shut every thing momentarily from the sight. It was only at intervals, therefore, that I could catch a glimpse of the horizon. The frigate was nearly hull down to leeward, flitting like a sea-gull in the white foam. Off to windward, rising and falling on the giant billows, her trim masts clearly defined against the sky, was my only hope, our little privateer. And how faint was that hope! It was against all human probability that I should ever stand on her deck again. She was now lying with her head to the wind, tossing on the surge, and if she altered her course, it would scarcely be in the direction of her powerful foe, where only she would meet me. There was no prospect before me but a lingering, horrid death. It was with difficulty I could cling to my spar; every wave that washed over weakened me, and often came with a jerk so sudden as almost to fling me from my hold. The gale, though it seemed to lull, still continued with awful power, and in the dying strength only left the swell more dangerous. As I thought of all this, my heart died within me. I saw nothing for my fate but a protracted death—starvation, and perhaps worse. For a moment I was tempted to drop my hold, and put an end to my suspense at once. But better feelings came across me. I thought of my poor, widowed mother, and the solemn counsel she had given me as she laid her hands meekly on my young head, and charged me, with her faltering, dying tones, never to forget my God. It came across my memory, in that dreadful hour like the whispering voice of an angel. I thought, too, of our sweet little New England cottage, and of the graveyard where my mother was laid. I burst into tears of contrition, and lifting up my voice, alone on that stormy ocean, with no one to hear me but my God, I prayed. The rushing hurricane bore it to the Being who holds the winds in his hand.

"Another hour must have passed while I was thus hopelessly tossed on the deep. As the morning advanced, the distance had gradually increased between the brig and myself. Suddenly I lost sight of her, and then, looking again, I saw she was once more put before the wind, and was coming rapidly down toward me, with her foretopsail straining in the gale. I knew now that the storm was lulling. I felt a new life within me. But a moment before, in that calm resignation which the certainty of our fate, however dreadful, brings upon us, I had gazed almost with apathy upon her; but now, as if by magic, my whole nature seemed changed, the stony disregard was gone, hope and fear ebbed in my heart, and a thousand stormy feelings rushed tumultuously through my soul. I clutched my spar, and strained my eyes upon the brig, trembling lest I should have deceived myself. The surges still washed over me, but I gazed dripping on that distant beacon ship. Once or twice she swerved a little from her course, and I held my breath till she wore round again. It was a half hour of thrilling suspense.

"Down at length she came. She was now not more than cable length distant, and with but one sail set, and every eye fixing in the strain, the spray at intervals sweeping far away by her, and all others burying her hull in a thick, white mist, she came careering over the giant billows with the velocity of a desert horse. It was plain, however, I was not seen. I shouted with all my might, but my puny voice went unheard down the gale. I had nothing to raise as a signal—how then could I attract attention? I knew, too, the difficulty with which such a small object as my spar and myself could be seen amid such a gale, and my late towering hopes at the thought perished in the bud. But a few minutes would decide my fate.

"All at once, I heard faintly the tap of the drum. They had at length missed me, and were beating to quarters to make it sure. I knew now that nothing would be omitted to recover me, but alas! how could they hope to find me so near them; besides the brig was already nearly upon me, and in a few minutes more would shoot by perhaps for ever. There was no time to be lost. I redoubled my efforts, and called with all my strength.

"'Foretop, there, do you see any thing of him?' thundered a well known voice.

"'No, sir,' came mournfully down the gale.

"'To be so near succor, to hear the voice, and yet to lose all—it was overpowering.

"'Up to the maintop—look sharp, my good fellow,' said the same anxious voice.

"'A point or two,' said the captain, waving his hand to leeward. The order swept them farther from me, and again, despair in despair, I shouted madly.

"I was still unseen. I felt moreover, that nothing I could do would aid my discovery. I must trust to chance now, however, that it was certain I was missing, the rugging swamped with honest, warm-hearted tars, and a hundred eager countenances bent from their stations eagerly on the look out.

"'I think I see something over the weather bow, sir,' sung out one of our captains, and the whole crew, as one man, turned anxiously in that direction. My heart sickened at the diminished chances of escape.

"'A port, then, in God's name!' shouted my uncle wildly.

"'Ahoy—in mercy's sake—a-ah-oy!' I gasped, prolonging the last cry in despair, as the brig went round, not fifty fathoms off.

"'Ahoy—a-hoy—a-h-o-y!' I screamed again in agony.

"'Hark!' said a mainstop man, noted for his sharp hearing, and with whom I had often laughed. 'I think I heard something—but,' he added dubiously, 'it's off here to lee-ward.'

"'Ahoy!' again, with supernatural strength, I shouted.

"'I see him—hurrah!' sung out the man at the foretop, forgetting all discipline.

"'Where!—where!' said fifty voices, the stentorian one of the commander rising over all.

"'Off here, over the leeward-bow, clinging to that spar.'

"'I see him!' shouted an old friend at the end of the fore-yard arm; 'brave boy, hurrah!'

"'There he is—there he is—there he is!' sung voice after voice, as the glad tale caught sight of me.

"'There he is—God be praised!' cried a voice from the main rigging. 'Starboard hard.'

"The emotions, thrilling, gushing, overpowering, of that moment I shall never forget. As my old uncle stood there, the only friend of my youth, with his head bared devoutly, and his long, thin gray hair streaming in the breeze, joyful feelings swept over me, and tears of gladness rushed blinding into my eyes. I scarce knew what I did in the ecstacy of the moment, but I recollect raising half up on my frail footing, and waving my arm as I hurrahed.

"'Hurrah!' shouted the old man, waving his hat around his head, and a hundred voices simultaneously made the welkin ring with their cheers.

"'Heave him a rope—throw out that float—hang on bravely, Harry!' said as many voices, and as the gallant brig rushed on me, the ropes fell thick around. I clapped the nearest. The giant fellow who had first heard me was planted in the fore rigging with a rope around his waist, and as they ran me in, he grasped me dextrously in his arm, and amid deafening shouts raised me fairly to the deck.

"'Make way, you lubbers—where's the captain?' cried he, carrying me towards the quarter-deck.

"'My boy—thank God!' was all the old man could ejaculate, and turning from the crew (for even in that hour his hatred of discipline prevailed) he dropped on my cheek the first tears I had ever known him to shed.

"'I didn't think, Harry, there was that on earth could make my old eyes wet, but come away, my lad,' and he turned to the quarter-deck. As he did so, my giant rescuer met his eye as he loitered near us.

"'Ay, ay, Jim, go to the purser, and tell him to give it to you still.'

"'Thankee, sir,' said he, touching his hat, as he hurried off.

"As we turned to go down, I cast a last look on the deck. Far, far away, hull down to leeward, could be seen the frigate, her tall, taper masts, with all their fine tracery just discernable, as if pencilled in the faintest outlines on the distant horizon. And that is my experience of Cape Horn."

"A narrow escape, by the gods," said my next neighbor, on the left—"but look at the lieutenant—how the old porpoise blows."

I turned to the old fellow on my right, and sure enough he was snoring away, fast asleep, with his head on his bosom, and the cup still held in his relaxed hand. A rivulet of tobacco juice, stealing out of the corners of his mouth, was finding its way down his chin.

"Pour Tom—his only fault is, he loves his cup," was all the company said, and then my neighbor was knocked down for a song.

The Prince of Wales.

We were not a little amused in reading in one of the late English papers, the proclamation issued by Queen Victoria, "creating our most dear son Prince of Wales!" It goes on—"that we do enable and invest by getting him with a sword, by putting a coronet on his head and a gold ring on his finger; and also, by delivering a gold rod into his hand that he may preside there (in Wales), and may direct and defend those parts." Is not all this the climax of transcendental humbuggery? The Queen gads her most dear "hinfant" as Mr. Weller would say, with a sword and paste a gold ring on his finger that he may defend old Cambria, a place by the way, which has been always able to defend itself. Only think of it: Arming a babe for the fight who cannot yet distinguish between sap and pancake. This is one of the many beauties of the monarchical system.

From the Boston Miscellany.

Eras in Woman's Life.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF ZSCHOKKE.

My father formed at the University an intimate friendship with a young and very gifted man named Waldern. When they left the high school, the night before their separation, with tearful eyes they pledged each other over a glass of punch and swore to remain true to each other even to their last moments; and whatever might be their future lot, if it were in any manner possible, they agreed to see each other every year. There have been many friendships sworn, and faith often pledged, over a glass of punch or wine, but people return to a more quiet state of mind,—they look back upon youthful enthusiasm, and smile at it,—they forget themselves. The time changes, and men change with them.

Yet it was different with my father and young Waldern. They kept their word and faith. They grew sober, but their hearts beat warmly, even in riper years. Their paths in life were very distinct, but their souls always turned toward each other, notwithstanding the distance which separated them. They married, but they never forgot their brotherlike tenderness. Once every year they visited each other, notwithstanding they were separated by a three days' journey. And even when they each had the engagements of an office, and a family of children, they devoted two or three weeks to their annual visit.

For several years, at first, the visits took place alternately at their different homes. Afterwards, it was usually my father who made the journey and was entertained by his friends. I do not know how this happened; but Waldern was rich by marriage and inheritance, dwelt in the city, and held an office at court, which gave him a great deal of occupation; those reasons might have kept him at home. My father held the office of head Forester in a village; his house had no superfluous room for guests accustomed to luxury; perhaps it was more pleasant to him to see, once a year, the varied bustle of the city, than for the courtier to inspect the woodcutting in a forest, or the table in a village; for some reason, however, it came at last to be the custom for my father, every summer, to take a journey and visit his friend.

I might have been a boy of ten years old, when my mother dressed me in new clothes from head to foot, and my father said,

"Gustavus, you shall go with me to the city this time. My brother Waldern has long desired to see you."

Who was so gay as I! The mama travelled with us this time. For a quarter of a year we looked forward to the journey. I was the only child remaining to my parents; they enjoyed my childish anticipations of the wonders of the city.

In fact, there was enough for me to see and hear in the city. It seemed to me like life on a fairy tale, every day something new. Waldern was an exceedingly agreeable man, but he had an only daughter, just so old as I was, named Augustina, who seemed to me much more agreeable even than he was. She jumped and danced taxas, have you seen my new doll?" Then she seized me by the arm, and I was obliged to admire the doll, whose splendid dresses, of which she had at least a dozen, were changed every day. I was also called to express my delight at the sight of the doll's furniture, her tables and chairs. The second day, however, Augustina let the doll repose, and rambled with me about the grounds. She taught me to dance, and I taught her to play soldier in the garden with flower stalks for guns. We were never separated, and then morning till evening in an incessant frolic and play.

"Listen, old friend," said Waldern, one evening, at supper, to my father, "we have charming children."

At these words I looked at Augustina, for I had not yet thought whether she were pretty or not. And to be sure her dark locks, confined only by a simple rose-colored band,—the delicate oval of her fine face,—the black, animated, roguish, good-humored eyes,—her red, pouting lips,—the graceful form of her whole body,—all appeared to me to be really pretty.

"Papa," cried Augustina, with a face wonderfully between sour and sweet, "if I only had such pretty hair and eyes as Gustavus, you would certainly think I should do very well."

"Old friend," continued Waldern, without suffering himself to be interrupted by the little vanity of Augustina, "our friendship must descend to our children, and they shall make a couple—it is plain they are intended for each other."

My father nodded smilingly, and raised his wine-glass. The old people touched glasses. I did not exactly understand what the Chamberlain meant by the inheritance. But Augustina explained it by a question she put to her father:

"Indeed, little papa," cried she, "do you mean that Gustavus shall be my husband? Oh, that is most charming. I shall certainly love him dearly. Oh, yes, papa, let it be so; do not you like it, Gustavus?"

A loud laugh sounded from the table. The next day we played man and wife.—We had a wedding, but before that we had a betrothal. In the garden, which was bordered by grape vines, we had our church between two acacia trees, which were then rare in Germany. A wooden garden bench was the altar; a cousin of Augustina's, somewhat older than we were, who often came to play with us, was the priest. Augustina had arranged everything; two pewter rings, set with green and glass stones, had been purchased; these were exchanged before the altar, and because on account of their large size they tumbled from our fingers, they had ribbon wound about them on the under side.

After the wedding, we went to a wedding feast in a corner of the garden. Table and chairs were placed, sugar plums of all kinds, cake and milk, were served up in a doll's tea set by the bride herself. Everything went off bravely. After the feast, we had a dance, the cousin being musician.

Yet with all this childish nonsense he repeated. Three weeks passed away in the city like a dream to me. And when we separated, there was sorrow and crying between the husband and wife. We begged them not to separate us, but our parents consoled us, laughed at our emotion, and at last took us from each other with the promise that we should soon have another visit.

We did not go back again so soon to the city as I wished. At home everything seemed empty, dead, and solitary. For some time I wept in secret for Augustina. And even when I ceased to grieve, and became accustomed again to the quiet house of my parents, and the stillness of the village and the forest,—for this soon happened—all was not yet right in every corner.

For this reason I was well pleased that a change took place. My father placed me at school in a neighboring city. I was delivered over to his acquaintance, the Rector of the school,—an old, worthy, learned man—as a pupil and a boarder. My mother wept bitterly when I went away from home. She packed my trunk closely with my clothes and books, but I found room enough to stow Augustina's pewter ring between the folds of a handkerchief. My good mother herself first carefully wrapped it up in paper.

A life of study with the Rector was not at first altogether pleasant to me, but I soon came to like the habits of the boys in school. Multiplication, division, compositions, dictations, extemporizing, all now went briskly along, and time went along with it. As the city where my education was conducted was only three miles from my native village, I was often at home. This was always a high festival for me, for I could only be there for a day at a time. Oh, maternal love! oh, heart of a father! How unspeakably happy was I every time I returned to the arms of my youthful sports.

The Rector, my master, was an excellent man; I loved him like a second father. His learning made him seem to me like a superior being. He had not much intercourse with the inhabitants of his little city. He delighted rather to live with the exalted spirits of other days, and with his youthful pupils; "for," said he, "there I see them perfected, and you tear in your hearts the seeds of perfection. Many of you will deceive my hopes; yet I hope by some to work in the world, when I no longer breathe under the heavens."

I now approached through the porch of the grammar into the holy of holies of ancient wisdom. Here dal Homer and Cicero excite me, but above all others Plutarch. I could have wept over the great world of the past. How merciful seemed to me the men of our own times, still, in fact, barbarians on whom may be seen the scars of the strong hand of slavery, and the dust of the people's wanderings. I read, I translated, I wrote verses, I was happy, as knowledge makes every young man.

I had nothing to do with the journeys to the city, though my father regularly made his visits there, in conformity to his old customs. I no longer sighed after it; I had altogether forgotten my little wife there. I should have lost her little pewter ring, if I had not put it aside with some other toys in a little bag, where it lay undisturbed for years. My vacations I usually spent at home in company with some of my fellow students, or made journeys to visit them at theirs.

Thus the years passed away. In my nineteenth, the Rector considered me prepared for the University, and my father sent me there. It was a bitter parting, for I was unwilling to leave the worthy man, who, in forming my mind, had laid the foundation of all my inward happiness. Still more unwillingly did I bid adieu to the neighboring home of my father, from which I should now be fourteen miles distant. Now, everything which I had prized and loved as a child, became more dear. I visited again all the scenes of my sports; and as I saw one day packing up for my journey, I did not neglect the little bag containing my playthings. I took out the smallest articles, as memorials and relisques of my departed childhood, and laid them near Homer and Horace in my trunk. Augustina's pewter ring was among them.

Notwithstanding I made verses in which the moon above and tender love, the young heart gay, the sun's bright ray, hearts and smarts, figured largely, yet of the little maiden and the city, I retained no distinct impression. I looked rather for the eyes of modest virgins, on which I could honorably make a couple of Petrarchian sonnets; but this I did with fear and trembling. And I cannot say that any one pair of the many eyes whose lightning glance I often met, ever inspired me to write an ode. And yet, among the Pandects, and Institutions, and other forms of science with which I was surrounded, because my father desired to see me a head forester, my mind still sighed for something. I did not know what it was, but I did not find it.

I had advanced so far, during the three years which I had passed at the University, that I was able to become Doctor utriusque juris. I was advised, after having taken my degree, to apply for a professorship, and give private lectures. But my father, as head forester, considered no office in the State so honorable as a forest Counsellor; and through the influence of the Chamberlain, Waldern, I was established as Referendarius in a provincial city.

"Come to my mind, I wished to visit my parents; they expected me, and I promised them, on setting out the time which I had passed at the University. My father wrote to me to meet him in the city, where he with my mother were going to visit our old friend Waldern. I had some farther directions respecting my office to receive from the latter.

I hastened thither, in compliance with these directions. On the journey I thought sometimes of Augustina, but always with aversion, as if I were ashamed of our childish joys. Meanwhile, thought I, she must be pretty well grown, and perhaps she is still handsome. But the thought was odious to me, that our parents would perhaps make a serious matter of these jests, and might couple us together in earnest. It seemed to me this meeting had been contrived for no other purpose. I took a mental oath this should never be.

And I kept my oath, but certainly against my will. For, after the first hearty embraces on entering Waldern's house, I looked round the apartment, and there, standing ready to salute every one, was a young lady, beautiful as a Hebe, with black, piercing eyes, to which I could no more look than into the noonday sun, without incurring the danger of being struck blind. Ah, I was already blind; I only saw that she saluted me with a bow and with blushing cheeks. What I replied to this, I do not know. I walked myself a thousand miles off; that I might collect my thoughts; and yet I should have rather died than have gone away.

I was fortunately relieved from my embarrassment by the embraces and questions of my parents and their friends. I was obliged to answer, and thus by degrees recovered my self-possession. I heard Mr. Waldern say to the charming unknown, "Augustina, is supper ready?" Alas, thought I, is that indeed Augustina? I had not courage to believe that this unearthly creature was once, in times past, my little wife. Such a thought seemed almost blasphemous.

We went into the supper room. Mr. Waldern offered my mother his arm, my father his to Madame Waldern, —Augustina remained for me. I tremblingly advanced to give her mine. She had better have offered me here, for certainly I needed a support.

"How you have grown," said she. "I should never have known you."

"And I,—and I—" stammered I. "I wish we were still little." This I said in all sadness. It was the silliest thing I could have thought of, for what girl of nineteen would wish to be a little miss again?

"Indeed! why do you wish that?" said she, in astonishment.

"Then I was so happy; oh, happy as now I shall never dare to be." Here a sigh burst from me, and I touched my left hand to her right, which was lying on my arm. Augustina remained an answer in my debt. Perhaps I had again said something foolish. I was ashamed of myself.

At supper the company was gay and lively. I became accustomed to Augustina's glances. I could even give back a tender answer, but eating was in spite of all reason, entirely out of the question. The more I looked, the more beautiful she seemed. The next day she was still more so; and the third, still more. It was manifest witchcraft. I repented my oath, which I had far too hastily made, in the post-chaise, on my journey, and resolved, without hesitation, to become perjured at some future time.

On the evening of the third day it happened. I know not how, that we found ourselves together in the garden. I had for some time desired to say something to her, but did not exactly know what it should be. We reached the grape-vine walk. I remembered it well.

"Oh, how large the two young acacias have grown," said I; "their branches now meet."

"Do you still remember those trees?" said Augustina, tenudly.

"Could I forget my happiness?" said I. "Oh, how often have my thoughts been here! Ah, you are often in this walk, I suppose, without thinking of your little Gustavus, who shed so many tears in parting from you."

"How do you know that?" said she, with a gentle, smiking voice.

We entered into the grape-vine walk; it was darkened by the shade of the acacias. I looked about me. All the world of my youth revived within me. I looked silently at Augustina. Ah, how different was everything now! Her eyes sunk to the ground. I took her hand. "Here was once the church."

She pointed to the green garden bench, and lisped, "There the altar; I know it all."

"Actually all?" said I.—"Ah Augustina, all?"

"Oh, Gustavus!" stammered she.

After a moment, I drew out the pewter ring of betrothal. "Do you remember this, Augustina?"

When she saw it, her countenance brightened. She took it, looked long at it, and her eyes grew moist. "It is the same," said she, and examined it again with extreme emotion. "Oh, Gustavus, you are better than I am." When she became more calm, she drew a gold ring from her finger, placed it on my hand, and put the pewter one on her own. "This I keep. I am thine for ever; art thou also mine, Gustavus?"

It will be understood that I answered as a poet of the age of twenty can answer. We swore by sun, moon, and stars, by the upper and the lower world, to love each other and belong to each other, on this side and the other side of the grave. Yet why should I relate all this circumstantially? Every one knows the use lovers make of time and eternity, heaven and earth. Love placed the Paradise of Adam and Eve about us. Three weeks passed away in innocence and bliss like a summer's dream. Then the talk was of parting. Good heavens! it seemed to me that I had but just arrived!

I wondered at the inattention of our parents. They might have seen what was passing between us. Our looks, our actions, everything betrayed that we were now going over a second time what we played ten years before. And yet the Director Waldern never said at supper what he said ten years before: "Old friend, our children must inherit our friendship; we must make a couple of them."

With Augustina I had never the courage to speak of a formal engagement with our parents,—of promise of marriage,—of legal betrothal,—a wedding, and such prosaic accidents of true love, which are demanded by common-sense, this was all too little, too profane for us. We supposed our parents had settled all such business between themselves.

Meantime the parting hour came, which we had dreaded for three days before. My father could be urged to stay no longer. The morning of departure, we two lovers, before sunrise, were in the dear grape-walk, to speak to each other once more alone, and explain all our feelings. With tears and vows the holy union was renewed. The vine-walk was actually changed to the church, the bench to the altar. We fell despairingly upon our knees, stretched our hands in prayer to heaven, and made the most solemn promises. I assured Augustina that as soon as I reached home, I would speak to my father, and then, returning to the city, would receive from her parents her hand. Augustina blushed crimson when I called her my bride, and future wife. She had her face in my bosom, and stammered, "Only Gustavus."

Thus we separated.

I had no sooner reached our village with my parents, than I seized the first opportunity to speak with my father alone, and reveal to him all my wishes and hopes of happiness. He, as well as my mother, had, during our journey, joked with me upon Augustina's conquest, when I had been lost in reveries. This gave me occasion for confession.

My father, a very sensible and upright man, and a tender parent, listened to me quietly and patiently; and patience was certainly needed, for I talked to him a whole hour, that I might explain to him the inviolable vow Augustina and I had made to each other.

"Child," said he, "I have nothing against it. I honor the feelings of both of you. I am glad you and Augustina love each other. The thought of her will guard you from many wrong thoughts and feelings. Yet I advise you, young, hardly more than two and yet no office which will give you a support. But this is necessary before marriage. Augustina is rich, to be sure, but you should not be supported by your wife. Nothing is more dishonorable than for a man to make himself dependent upon the property of a wife, and have to thank her for a fortune. The husband should be a man, and by his wealth and his labors support his wife and children. I myself, from my office of Forester, derive but a moderate income. I can only give or leave you a small property. You must first labor for yourself, as I have labored for myself.

"These circumstances may, perhaps, have the effect of causing my friend Waldern to refuse you, at least for the present, the hand of Augustina. She, brought up in the bosom of luxury, is accustomed to certain convenience, that have become necessaries to her. You are not in a condition to provide her with these necessaries. Yet another circumstance is added to all these. The age of both of you not favorable for a long continued happy marriage. Augustina is about as old as you are. This is not well. Woman comes to maturity earlier, but she fades also earlier than man. You would be unhappy to have an old wife when you are still in the fullness of your manly strength. Between a man and woman of the same age, there is always a difference of at least ten years."

In this manner spoke my father. Every one will perceive he was manifestly wrong. I proved it to him as clear as the sun, and was very much astonished that he did not admit the force of my reasoning. I appealed to my mother.

"Gustavus, you are right," said she, "I must own you are right. Augustina is an angel; I do not wish for a better daughter-in-law. But your father is right, too. I can advise you nothing better than he has done. God help you," said she, weeping and tenderly kissing me.

We had now daily conversations and consultations. We never came to any conclusion. I suffered unspeakably in silence. After a week or two, when I was making preparations to begin my journey to the city, and from there to the little town where I was to shine as a Referendary, a letter came from Waldern to my father. Mr. Waldern's letter was full of complaints and lamentations about Augustina, who, after my departure, was inconsolable, and was obliged to take to her bed with a fever. She had now become more tranquil. But he adjured me, now that I had no possession by which I could, without making myself ridiculous, think of a serious engagement with his daughter, not to visit the city again. I should only, by doing so, fruitlessly renew her sorrow and endanger her health. He repeated to me what he had already said to his daughter, that he did not object at all to the union, if I were in any office which would afford me a considerable income, and which I could not fail to be in, in a few years. Still farther, he had no objections to my keeping up a correspondence with Augustina, to make up for our separation, if I wished it.

This letter at first entirely overpowered me. I raved and raged against the tyranny and cruelty of men, till from fatigue I became quiet. I then began to think that Waldern had written very sensibly, and had promised me more than, from what my parents had said to me, I had a right to expect. The letter gave me, even, a sort of triumph over my father. I blessed Waldern. I resolved to act like a man, and to win the hand of Augustina by my exertions. The permission to correspond by letter, I availed myself of at once. I wrote Augustina a letter three pages long, and a short one to Mr. Waldern, filled with my grateful emotions.

Waldern had worldly wisdom. He knew the human heart, and did not strive to dam up the violent stream of youthful inclination. The stream would only have become more furious and powerful and destructive. Now it flowed more quietly.

I did not journey toward the city, but went to the place where, as Referendary, I was to enter the course which was to lead me to an office of more profit and trust. The parting from my dear parents, the diversions of the journey, the first entrance into my new abode, and the beginning of the business of my office, had no small effect in bringing me to a more tranquil state of mind.

I labored with the most untiring diligence to perform in the most perfect manner, the duties of my calling. My exertions were noticed. Every one did honor to my knowledge of business. I had but one fault. I was too young. I must first reach the age of manhood. Oh, how I sighed for my five-and twentieth year!

At last I reached it. One lives up to a ney age, if he does not die first! But there was sorrow here. My good mother died at that time, and a few months after her my father also. Yet my father had the pleasure, before his death, of seeing me Assessor in a Provincial College, with the title of counsellor, and endowed with a small salary. A great step toward the summit of my wishes, the hand of Augustina.

My correspondence with my beloved was in a good way. To be sure, during the first years we never wrote a letter which was not three pages long. In the course of the second year, we cut off at least half; and by the third, it was reduced to a single page. Time does wonders, but it does not extinguish true love. Augustina had, in the mean time, refused several young men who had paid their addresses to her. My letters were generally filled with regret that I was not yet in a situation to ask her hand. My present salary was barely sufficient for my own personal expenses. The little inheritance from my father was nearly expended. She on her part assured me her parents were daily becoming more and more desirous she should accept some of the proposals of marriage which were made her, because she would soon have reached a certain age, when she would not be in

I saw, as I remarked, a dancer that might be called incontestably the queen of all the beauties present. The young man fluttered like butterflies about her. It warmed my heart, if the eyes of the pretty Sylphide sometimes turned toward me; and to my astonishment that happened often. But at last it seemed to me as if I had seen this lovely figure in some company before, perhaps in the city, at Augustina's. I asked my neighbor who she was. Heavens! it was Adela! very different, certainly; in her ball dress from herself in her riding veil. As she went to rest after the last dance, I, a butterfly of thirty-one, approached the young lady, and she was as kind as to recognize her travelling companion. We danced. I inquired after the health of her father, regretted that business had prevented me from visiting him,—an exaggeration, perhaps, but before such an angel one must wash himself clean. I promised myself soon the pleasure of a visit, with a pleasant freedom. She secured me a visit from me would give her father great pleasure.

The ball caused a great revolution in me. The President of the Criminal Court became again a poet. I could not sleep for the whole night long; I saw nothing but celestial glances, dancing seraphim, and Adela floating between them. I wondered that so lovely, so amiable, so bewitching a maiden had not yet found a husband. Her father, they say, is as worthy as she is beautiful; but, alas, he has not much wealth! Oh, the fools! After a few days I went to visit the minister,—repeated the visit from week to week. Soon I was considered as a friend of the family; Adela would even reproach me if I staid away beyond the usual day, and once she actually came into her eyes when I pretended that perhaps she would prefer I should not come so often. We quarrelled sometimes, for the sake of making up again, and, even in the course of the reconciliation I have lost a kiss, which did not renew the quarrel. She was silent, and her cheeks glowed with the deepest red. In short, I loved and was beloved. The worthy father shrugged his shoulders, and said, "You have no treasure with her but love, virtue and economy; but he who knows how to value these, has more than a ton of gold."

With the first flowers of spring, I wove the bridal wreath for my Adela. Her father himself blessed our union before the altar of his village church. And now, be the rule of my noble little wife, I was the happiest of the happy.

In time we saw ourselves surrounded by blooming children,—angels of love,—who united us more tenderly to to each other. Adela became more and more lovely every day; a young mother is certainly more lovely than the most beautiful girl. The pure soul of Adela elevated my own ideas to a point they had never reached before. Man is never entirely happy, until he has the courage to be virtuous. Before my marriage, I had only thought of saving and amassing wealth; but when some years of our wedded life had passed, Adela's excellent management had made me feel that if I were to lose all I was worth, I could never be unhappy while Adela and my children were left me.

I now found that my departed father was entirely right in what he said when dissuading me, from my pursuit of Augustina, in regard to the relative age of a husband and wife. For, when I had reached my fortieth year, and Adela her thirteenth, and we had children of six and eight years old frolicking about us, Adela was still a handsome woman, who might have made conquests. Augustina, on the contrary, had arrived at a matronly age.

I seldom heard from the latter. We themselves never wrote to each other. I heard sometimes from strangers, that she was somewhat faded, but that she was surrounded by a coterie of young men, particularly poets and artists, to whom her open table was very agreeable. I pointment to the easy and honorable office which I now hold. This office made it necessary for me to live in the city; and from there to the University, where my son was pursuing his studies, was only a moderate day's ride. We were together so often as we wished.

Adela, indeed, left with regret her native city; but of the court residences she had heard often, and it had a charm for her maternal heart in its proximity to her first-born son. She was in her fortieth year,—no longer the ideal beauty which I thought her, when, at our first meeting, I saw her beside me in the carriage; but her features had acquired more exalted charms, her form had added dignity to grace. The heart of Adela had retained its youth. I loved her with the first love. Her lovely face, fostered by no passion in her youth, needed no false colouring to make it charming.

She knew my early relations with Augustina, and when we came to the city, she was very curious to become acquainted with my first love.

Three or four months passed away before I visited Madame Von Winter, for I felt little inclination to do so. We were told she no longer received company, that she lived extremely retired, and had become in her later years as avaricious as she had before been extravagant. This change of feeling might be considered as a consequence of her passion for gaming, to which she gave herself up, when she was no longer young enough for gallantry. She was most frequently found at mass, for, some years before existed by the romantic poets of the fashionable school, she had thrown herself into the bosom of the only true church, and had become a catholic.

When I visited her now for the first time, I was conducted again into the garden. As I passed through the house, I had seen pictures of the saints hanging on the dusty walls. The garden was like a wilderness, and thorns grew where Augustina and I once enjoyed the marriage feast. The acacias had been cut down, out of economy, to make firewood. The Chinese temple had lost all its outward ornaments, and was covered with honest dutch tiles; little painted gothic windows of coloured glass, like the church windows of the times of romance, and a cross on the top of the roof, made the little house resemble a chapel.

And so it was. As I entered I saw an altar, a crucifix, and an eternal lamp. Madam Winter, fifty years old, clad in a very simple matronly dress, just risen from her devotions, came to meet me, her rosary in her hand, and the murmur of prayer on her lips.

I stood still before her. She knew me, and seemed pleased. I could not conquer my feelings, but without moving I took her hand, and with mesmerized eyes pointed to the chapel. "Ah, Augustina," cried I, "when the light vine-flower stood here, when we in happy childhood exchanged our pewter rings,—when, ten years after, lover and beloved, we gave and received the first kiss of our innocent love, and vowed before heaven"—

"I beseech you, think no more of such vain children's play," interrupted she.

"Ah, Augustina, it was not well to change the simple vine-flower into the splendid boudoir; still worse that I should see the golden ring of love thrown away at the faro table; and now a chapel!"

"Sir," said Madame Winter, "we are cured at last of the intoxication of the world and its vain pleasures. You wound my heart by such recollections. If your salvation is dear to you, follow my example, learn to forsake a false world, and call upon the saints in heaven for their intercession."

When I returned home, I said to Adela, "No, dearest, we will not go to see her. I no longer know her. She has become a bigoted devotee. Oh, all-powerful Time!"

SATURDAY POST.

EDITED AND PUBLISHED BY

GEORGE R. GRAHAM & CO.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 19.

State Interest Paid.

The laudable efforts of the Governor of this State to provide means for the payment of the interest on the public debt have at length proved successful, and the proper officers have been engaged during the week at the Bank of Pennsylvania in satisfying the holders of scrip. The faith of the Commonwealth has thus been redeemed. Nothing but a series of unforeseen events could have prevented the liquidation of the interest on the first of February. The Executive deserves credit for the energy which he displayed in this emergency.

The injunction on the Bank of Pennsylvania will now be removed and that institution re-open her doors. Her condition it is apparent is as good as that of most of the other banks.

☞ J. H. McKnight, Esq., of Dundas, Canada, is duly authorized to act as agent for Graham's Magazine, the Saturday Evening Post, and the Lady's World of Fashion.

first stand, will not become a lam,—and the gloom which hung over us last week is partially, though only partially dissipating.

We are no politicians, and rarely mingle in public affairs. We have, therefore, said nothing as to what should be done in the present or in any former emergency, for it is difficult, in times of excitement, to know one's sentiments, without misrepresentation. Besides, the public affairs in this State, have been so long in the hands of sharpers of both parties, that it would be a work of supererogation to say anything against them. We have, therefore, maintained silence. On the Resumption Bill, as at first contemplated, we have, however, a word to say. Our remarks will relate only to that portion of the Bill which funded the Relief Notes of 1841.

A more iniquitous measure, in our opinion, then this would have been, has never been projected by our Legislature,—and we incline to think that the climax was penned in a moment of irritation, or under an ignorance of the true state of the case. These notes were issued on the faith of the State. They formed a sort of forced loan from the Banks. Had the people imagined that they were to be funded at the will of the Legislature, when State Stock was only worth fifty cents on the dollar, no man would have been found silly enough to touch the notes. But it was thought that the State had a high sense of her own honor, and that she would not, therefore, lend her countenance to paper which she was afterwards wantonly to depreciate fifty per cent. We know it is said that these notes are liabilities of Car Banks, and that as the State is only collaterally bound to redeem them, even her offer to fund them is "a gratuity," a matter of grace. But a Commonwealth stands in a different light from individuals. She should shelter herself behind no pettifogging excuse, she should scorn to avail herself of a mean technicality. It was understood that the Relief Notes were issued on the faith of the State, and that so long as she remained honest, these notes would be good. They were taken by innocent parties on this understanding. And now the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania steps in, and by an act of her own, reduces them down to half their value. Noble act!—commendable justice!

This act would have been the more iniquitous because the loss would have fallen chiefly on the poor, among whom small notes like the Relief ones, mostly circulate. During the panic on Thursday of last week, many a laboring man, or indigent widow, sold their notes at a ruinous sacrifice; and if the bill had passed, the distress from this cause, would have been increased a hundred fold. It is well that the Legislature paused. To have passed this clause of the Resumption Bill would have been to shake hands with repudiation.

Truth Work of Congress.

Congress has now been in Session ten weeks, and we note ask, as we did at the end of the third week, what has been done? Comparatively nothing. Long speeches have been made and the usual amount of daily pay been squandered, but neither the finances of the nation nor the people themselves, are in any better condition than when the first member put his foot into the stage prior to the opening of the session. This waste of the public time has been committed, moreover, when at least two subjects, of paramount importance, are claiming the attention of Congress. The first is the state of the treasury—the second is the apportionment of the representation.

We are glad to see, however, that, during the past week, the members of the House have shown more desire to expedite the public business. The case of Mr. Adams has occupied the greater portion of two weeks, but it is now postponed, and will not, we suppose, be resumed for some time. This case has been one of vast moment, and the people generally have not grudged the time occupied in the discussion, although all honest men must regret that it could not have been conducted with less asperity and personality. To the discussion may be attributed part of the delay which many important bills have met with in Congress. We question, however, if, after all, this discussion will not ultimately prove a saving of time to the community. Men are never so ready to act as after a full expression of opinion; and both Mr. Adams and his opponents have availed themselves of these opportunities for a fortnight past. The truth of our remark is verified by the avidity with which Congress has recommenced its usual routine of business after this exciting debate. The National Intelligencer says on this point.

"The House has also made a beginning upon the Annual Appropriation Bills, which, under charge of the very efficient Chairman of its Committee of Ways and Means, have been digested and prepared with a care, precision, and minuteness of examination, never exceeded, to say the least of it, on any former occasion. Two of these bills, having passed the House, have already become laws, the Pension Appropriation Bill being one of them. As for the remaining Appropriation Bills, and especially the Civil Appropriations Bill, if any opinion may be formed from the indications of the last week, its progress through the House will be very deliberate, if not slow, and even tedious. With this prospect before the House, desirable as we admit it to be, that the Appropriation Bills should be passed at an early day, we cannot but think that, in regard to another measure yet more urgent—the bill for the Apportionment of Representatives under the new Census—it is very desirable that its passage should be expedited by some such order on the part of the House as was proposed on Saturday by the respected Chairman of the committee who reported the bill, viz. to make it the Order of the Day from a given day until finished, and to limit the discussion of it to a day certain, (so that it should not for too long a time obstruct the passage of the Appropriation Bills.) The time is rapidly drawing nigh at which some of the States have been accustomed to make their elections of Representatives to Congress; and soon, as every reader knows, the action of the Legislature of every one of the States will be necessary to give effect to the apportionment bill after Congress shall have passed it, it is quite obvious that Congress cannot act upon the subject too soon. In addition to which, it ought to be an influential argument with Members, that the Legislatures of some of the States have expressed an earnest desire that Congress will act upon the subject at the earliest possible moment.

"The two last days of the past week were commendably employed, according to the injunction of the Rules of the House in the consideration of Bills and Reports upon Private Claims. It would be a great honor to the present Congress, and would distinguish it in history, if it were, in judicial phrase, to clear the docket of all business of this character. The ends of justice, as well as of humanity, would be thereby promoted, not to speak of the honest pride which every Representative would have in being able to say to his constituents, when he returns to his home, that, so far as depended upon him, he has left undone nothing that he ought to have done—a duty correlative and equally imperative with that of doing nothing which he ought not to do."

Electric Telegraph.

Dr. Lardner, in one of his recent lectures, gave a description of the electric telegraph, certainly one of the most curious inventions of the day. "The telegraph" he says, "was invented by a Mr. Wheatston of London, who had devoted much time to the subject of electricity. The object of the telegraph is by the aid of electricity to communicate between two distant places in a very short space of time. In England it has already been applied along a railway for some hundred or more miles. All that is necessary is to go to the office at one end and ask his question; in about three minutes he receives an answer. I chanced myself, while engaged in railway operations, to witness an operation of this kind, and I shall not soon forget my astonishment at the result. I was standing near the office of the Great Western Railroad, when a passenger got out of the train of cars which had just arrived (over forty miles) from London, went into the office and told the clerk that he wished to send by the returning train a note to his hotel in London, concerning a cloak and umbrella he had left there. "Yes, sir," said the clerk, "wait a moment and I will give you the answer to your note." He turned to a small apparatus in a corner of the room, and in about three minutes told the man that his cloak and umbrella had been taken care of, and would be sent by the next train.

"The method of the operation of this invention is extremely simple, and is easily rendered intelligible. I have already explained the nature of the galvanic current which is produced when zinc, or copper, or other metals are brought in contact. The electricity evolved at the surface of contact is decomposed, the positive taking one direction and the negative the other; hence, if two wires be provided and put in contact, the one with the positive and the other with the negative fluid, these two currents will flow along them for any distance—even around the globe. Now, if a magnetic needle be placed over the wire along which these galvanic currents flow, it will be immediately turned at right angles to the wire, no matter what was its former direction. Now, suppose a wire be enclosed in a glass tube, or surrounded by some non-conducting substance, and passed the whole distance from New York to New Orleans, a needle placed above the wire at New Orleans would instantly turn at right angles to it upon sending along it the electric current. This would be the case with any number of wires. Thus we have a method of communicating instantly between distant places. The next thing is to devise some means of rendering the communication intelligible. A variety of signals have been employed for this purpose. In Wheatston's telegraph the letters of the alphabet were employed, and the mode of conducting it was this; at each end of the route was provided a lozenge marked off into the different letters of the alphabet.

"Magnetic needles were placed above the wires in such a position with respect to the figures that any two of the needles may be made to point to each of the letters by the action of the fluid which, on being passed along the wires, causes them to turn at right angel to the wires.

"Now, in communicating from end to end, the person who makes the first advances passes a current along the wire, which lets go a bell at the other extremity—thus, a wire touched at New Orleans would let go a bell here, and its language is "I'm going to send you a message, so look about you." The person receiving this warning sends back a current which lets go a bell at the other end, saying in reply, "Go on, sir, I am listening to you." They then begin to spell out the words, if that is the method adopted. If E be the first letter, then two wires are touched, which will cause two needles at the other end to point to that letter on the lozenge, and so for all other letters. In general practice fewer letters are necessary than those of the alphabet."

The manner in which these telegraphs are constructed in England is thus—the wires, of which there are five or six, are placed in glass tubes and buried several inches in the ground beside the rails. One is now nearly finished from London to Liverpool, and by it messages are transmitted with astonishing rapidity. For commercial purposes these telegraphs are of especial importance.

Kendall Alive.

Kendall, the witty editor of the New Orleans Picayune, who was taken prisoner in the Santa Fe Expedition, has written a letter to his brother editors in which he states that he is alive and well. We think some extracts will be interesting to our readers.

Chihuahua, Mexico, Nov. 27, 1841.

My Dear Friends.—You have doubtless, ere this, heard that your humble servant was in what may justly be termed "a bad mess," but this is the first time I have had a chance of letting you know it myself.

On the 15th September last, after suffering hardships almost incredible on the prairies, in the way of starvation, &c., myself, with four others, were taken prisoners by a detachment of Mexicans near San Miguel, New Mexico. After a confinement of some five weeks at Miguel, a town some 50 miles from Santa Fe, I was taken and brought to this city, with near 200 of the troops (prisoners) attached to the Texan Santa Fe Expedition. To-morrow or next day we are all to start for the city of Mexico, where we shall probably arrive in February, and where I have the strongest hopes of gaining my liberty once more, and soon after my arrival. It appears a little singular, does it not, that I, an individual perfectly innocent, and with no wrong intentions towards this government, should be thus made a prisoner of and marched a distance of 1600 to 2000 miles! but at present we are well treated, and I have no reason to complain, although my case is a peculiarly hard one. One thing, however, I have gained by the operation—health, and that of the best kind.

This is a place I should like extremely well if I had my liberty, as the people are kind-hearted and very attentive and obliging to strangers. At Passo, a town some three hundred miles from this, I received favors from the priest of the place, such as would not be granted or considered by any minister of the gospel out of Mexico—but of all this I shall speak further when I get home.

Once more, I say to all, keep "stiff upper lips." Tell all my friends that I shall "manifest" myself among them one of these days.

Hoping that you are all enjoying as good health as myself, I remain still. Geo. Wilkins Kendall.

☞ It is so long since I have written, that I have almost forgotten how!!

We hope soon to hear of the release of Kendall and his associates. The prompt steps taken by our government for this purpose reflect high credit on it.

By another conveyance we have a letter from Mexico giving an account of the arrival of a portion of the Santa Fe Expedition at Mexico. The letter writer says that 96 of the prisoners (among whom are Col. Cook, Dr. Richard Brenham, of Shelbyville, Kentucky, young Combs, of Lexington, Kentucky, and Messrs. Lubech, Brown, Hunt, and Seery, officers, arrived on the 25th of December, at the convent near the Chapel of Guadalupe, within two miles of the city. He describes their condition as worthy of the extreme, being bare-footed, covered with filth and all kinds of vermin, and in chains. They were at once marched to the Palace in the city, there to be reviewed to Santa Anna. It being night, his Excellency was indulging in a siesta, which forbade interruption. They were therefore submitted under a strong guard, to the jeers and sneers of the Mexican populace, which had assembled under the pursuit, within a few hundred yards of the Palace, and then marched through the principal streets and public places. The guard which now accompanies them in their daily degrading occupation of street-cleaning, consists of 60 men. They work together in couples, connected by strong chains. Cook and Brenham are chained together.

A Great Suit.

The suit before the Supreme Court of the U. States, respecting the claim of land proprietors to the oysters, &c. in waters adjoining their property has at length been decided. Eight of the Judges out of nine, gave opinions against the claimants, so that any body is now allowed to take for oysters in the New Jersey waters. As the subject is a curious one, we will give a short history of it, condensing our remarks from the Chief Justice's opinion, which lucidly explains the points involved in the trial.

The province of New Jersey was given by Charles II. to his brother James, Duke of York, by letters patent, confirming on him the prerogatives of government and all the prerquisites of the crown, as well as the property of the soil. The Duke of York shortsaide assigned his sole interest in East Jersey to a company of 20 proprietors. The proprietors, becoming involved in a controversy with the crown, in 1702 surrendered all their prerogatives of government back to the crown, retaining to themselves the property in the soil. The question now pending was, whether the use of the soil that is covered with navigable waters and which is now valuable for the oyster fishery, passed to the crown as an appendage of the government, or was retained by the proprietors as a part of the property in the soil. We quote:

"The Chief Justice said the King held the power to grant newly discovered lands, not as his individual property, but as the head of the nation, and acting in his public capacity. By the laws of England, the right of fishing in navigable waters is a national right of all the people, and it is a question quite unsettled in England, whether, since the granting of Magna Charta, the King has the power to grant an exclusive fishery in such waters. But when, by the Revolution, the sovereignty of New Jersey became vested in the people, the power of granting a fishery was to be tested by different principles.

"There was nothing in the form of the grant to the Duke of York which would sever the right of navigable waters and the fishing in them and sell under them, from the sovereignty, and attach it to the proprietry of the soil. It was therefore to be understood, that this right passed to the Duke, and from him to the proprietors, and from them back to the crown, as one of the royalties, in the same manner as the navigable waters of England pertain to the crown, in trust, for the common use of the people.

"The surrender returned every thing pertaining to prerogative, to the crown, in the same manner, and to the same extent, that it had been granted to the Duke of York.

"If it had been the intention of the proprietors to retain to themselves the right of soil under navigable waters, it would have been so expressed in the deed of surrender.

"The Chief Justice further dwelt at some length on the fact that this right had been enjoyed by the people of New Jersey from the year 1702 until within a few years, undisturbed. He also referred to other charters that had received a similar construction, and to the great interests which would be unsettled by a contrary construction.

"The conclusion is, that the proprietors are not entitled to recover, and the decision of the Circuit Court is reversed.

"Judge Thompson said he did not assent to the decision of the Court, and should give his reasons.

"Judge Baldwin said he dissented from the opinion throughout."

The law may decide that any one has a right to gather oysters in the New Jersey waters; but as we happen to know something of the Egg Harbor men, we would advise interlopers not to be found on the oyster beds of Mullica, or any other New Jersey river.

Squadron in the Pacific.

There is a strong and sensible article in the U. S. Gazette for Tuesday last, respecting the insufficiency of the squadron at present in the Pacific. Every Naval commander who has been on that station has given testimony to the inadequacy of the force sent to protect our interests in that quarter. The vast amount of capital engaged in the whaling business demands that attention should be paid to this matter. The Gazette speaks thus on this point:

"Among the largest and most important interests at stake in that quarter, is that of our whale fisheries. The cruising grounds of our whalers are all remote from the continent, and their rendezvous is usually at some of the groups of islands. At this critical juncture, as indeed it has been heretofore, this vast and important branch of our commercial marine, this splendid nursery of seamen, is entirely without protection.

"We observe allusion in terms of no little severity to that economy which would save a cent to-day at the loss of dollars to-morrow. He also alludes to the misappropriation of funds for purposes of defence. He remarks thus:

"Great care is taken and very great expense incurred in manufacturing and in preserving arms and ammunition, our rigid economists vote cheerfully for all these appropriations. Let us tell them that it is a much cheaper way to keep up the military spirit to infuse up, a splendid commercial marine, and that all the arms and ammunition in the country are not worthy of a thought when compared with our interests which float upon the sea. And yet countless thousands are lavished upon the one, while stinted appropriations are doled out to the other with all the reluctance of penury to unworthiness. Besides, as a mere matter of dollars and cents, an efficient protection to our interests in the Pacific would enable enterprise to secure a flourishing commerce, the value of which to the nation would amply repay the expense of protection."

This matter is one which should be well understood. The possession of the Oregon Territory may yet be dependant on the force we may keep in the Pacific. In the present exhausted condition of the treasury it would scarcely be politic to expend much in increasing the force in the Pacific; but the subject should not be forgotten when the ability of the government shall be on its old footing. We have done, in obtaining the confidence of gentlemen of respectability and wealth. But he certainly did succeed, and most have wasted an immense amount of money within a short time.

It is but proper to state, that since the 1st of January last, Mr. Boyd has not had any connection with the Tuwanda Bank.

Wonderful Escape.

During the late freshet on the Mohawk the lives of more than one person were in imminent danger. One of these persons was saved from almost instant death miraculously. The river was full of timber floating down with the roaring current, and the mass of water as well as the accumulation of timbers soon grew to be so powerful as to sweep everything away before them. During its mad career, the freshet came to Miller's bridge, a part of which instantly lodged under water. John McGee, a young man of great daring, made an extraordinary leap, and succeeded in saving himself.

Unfortunately Mr. George Woodford was upon the sinking end of the bridge, and in imminent danger of being crushed. With great presence of mind, in an instant, he threw off his overcoat, sprang into the water, passing entirely beneath the timbers, and not rising to the surface until he had passed both bridges. Not having been able to free himself from his boots and other garments, he became much exhausted by this wonderful feat; but at this moment he secured floating planks, and placing himself upon them, was carried down the stream at a rapid rate near half a mile, when his raft struck upon a quantity of lodged brush and flood wood. On this pile he endeavored to save himself; but in getting upon it, he lost his planks.

The horror of his situation, says the Utica Observer, may be imagined. Midnight darkness prevailed—he was in the midst of a rapid current, surrounded by floating ice, and a heavy rain was beating his bare head—he feels the pile beneath him giving way—in a moment all dissolved, and again he is compelled to swim for life. Becoming greatly chilled, he finds his strength fast failing him—he is borne down by the flood—one effort and Parker of the spot, gained the stream difficultly he reaches it, and climbs into its branches. Here he commenced calling loudly for assistance, and fortunately was heard by Mr. Rogers and others who were in search. Lights and a boat were procured, and Mr. W. was rescued from his perilous situation. Seldom is recorded so remarkable an escape from death.

The Late Floods.

The boom of the Mohawk Navigation Company, as well as on the Mohawk waters. The Danville Intelligencer of the 11th inst. says:

"Up to this date, in the present winter season, the river opposite Danville has not been frozen over, and most of the time there has been little ice in the North Branch. The ice that had formed in the Shamokin Pool moved off on the evening of the 30th ult. and soon after the ice that had formed in the creeks, and at the head of the branches of the Susquehanna, passed off. In consequence of the warm weather, and heavy showers of rain to the North, the snow was suddenly melted, and produced the highest fresh in the branches of the river we have ever had in the winter season. The West Branch was at its height on Friday or Saturday last, and the North Branch on Sunday. On the North Branch overflowed the Canal in several places, and much damage has been done by the washing and breaking of the banks, and we understand the Fishing Creek aqueduct has been materially injured. The flood touched the lower weather board of one of the reaches of the Danville Bridge, but no great damage was done to the Bridge, except the breaking of some of the weather boards by the projecting limbs of the drift-wood. While the water was up, for several hours the wind dashed the waves against the banks of the river, and in some places the banks have been undermined and washed in, thereby damaging the land, the fences and the road. The lowland along the river was all under water, as usual in time of high water, to the injury of fences, grain in the ground, and, in some places, no doubt, to the destruction of cattle."

Temperance in Congress.

The temperance society formed by the members of Congress is in a highly flourishing condition. The National Intelligencer contains a copy of the Constitution. The Hon. George N. Briggs, of Massachusetts, is the President of the Society. The Vice Presidents are as follows:

Vice Presidents.—Thomas W. Gilmer, of Virginia; Thomas Henry, of Pennsylvania; Samuel S. Bowne, of New York; Thomas F. Marshall, of Kentucky; Edmund Deberry, of North Carolina; Harvey M. Watterson, of Tennessee; John Thompson Mason, of Maryland; Calvary Morris, of Ohio; John Mattocks, of Vermont.

Secretary—J. M. Howard, of Michigan.

Treasurer—Seth M. Gates, of New York.

Executive Committee—Lott Warren, of Georgia; Thomas W. Williams, of Connecticut; James Irwin, of Pennsylvania; Charles Hudson, of Massachusetts; Lewis Riggs, of New York.

The preamble of the Constitution is as follows:

"Regarding the use of intoxicating liquors as injurious, and tending to produce individual and social evils of the most dangerous kind, and desiring in our individual example and our united efforts, to check and control those evils, we do hereby agree to form ourselves into a Temperance Society, and adopt the following."

This is a noble example and will have a noble effect. The friends of Temperance will hail the movement with unmitigated delight.

Lost from Tampico.

By the brig Norfolk, Capt. Matthews, at this port from Tampico, we are favored with advices from that place to the 21st January. There is no political news by this arrival. Business generally was very inactive, and all descriptions of dry goods were exceedingly dull. The most important item of intelligence received by the Norfolk, is that the Government has decided upon returning the 10 per cent. duty which they had charged upon goods going into the interior. The mode of payment at our last dates, (January 21) was then under discussion, but not settled. The Cornelia was not expected at Tampico until the 5th February. The Norfolk has brought about $10,000 in specie, and has a full cargo of fustian, hides, goat skins, &c. A schr. was going into Tampico as the N came out, which Captain Matthews supposed was the Vigilant from this port. The Apalachicola and Doric were at Tampico the 21st ult., the former to cail for New Orleans in 2 days, and the latter for do. soon.

German Railway.

The Prussian State Gazette publishes a long article on the railways of Germany, the result of which is the division of all the lines of railway into the following

Miles finished	1,761	Miles have cost	$70,000,000
Miles in course of construction	1,011	Which will cost	45,500,000
Miles determined upon	1,011	Yet required	21,500,000
Miles projected	2,611	Proximate cost to	36,500,000
Miles, item of mention	1,761	Proximate do	45,000,000
Total number of miles	1,761	Cost	$137,000,000

The Leipzic Gazette, on the other hand, announces that the Austrian Government has decided on authorizing the construction of a railway between Vienna and Dresden, by the valley of the Elbe. It is expected that all possible favor will be conceded to the plan, and that there will even be the guaranty of an interest of 4 per cent.

Box Ball in New York.

The Gothamites seem bent on outrying the Bostonians in their hospitalities to Boz. He arrived in New York, on Saturday last, and was already engaged on Monday, it is said, to a round of parties, dinners and other entertainments which would occupy his time during the fortnight he proposes to remain in our sister city. He had become indebted to the Penn Township Bank in a large amount, for which ample collateral security was held, but on Wednesday, it was deemed important that he should be arrested on the suit of that institution, and accordingly, Mr. Saunders, the Sheriff's officer, proceeded to a house in Schuylkill Seventh below Vine st., and took him into custody. Mr. Boyd proceeded through a part of the city with the officer, and saw several persons. We at the office of William L. Hirst, Esq. the attorney for the Bank. He was also at the Bank, and went thence to the office of his counsel, C. Gaillon, Esq. whence he departed early on Thursday morning, returning, by his request, to the House in Schuylkill Seventh street. There, having packed up his clothes, and burnt some papers, he returned to the officer, when he mentioned that he had left something. He went up stairs, and shot himself with a pistol, which he had carried in his pocket. He lingered until about nine o'clock on Thursday, and died, making no explanation that we could hear of touching his recent acts.

The act was committed by placing the pistol in his mouth. The ball passed through his head, and lodged in the vertebra.

Boyd had distinguished himself, before this unfortunate connection with the Towanda Bank, by some transactions, which drew upon him suspicions of bad intentions. But within a year or two, he seems to have managed to win the confidence, and spread the money, of men who, it might be supposed, would not easily be deceived.

Boyd was a married man, and had one family, we believe, in one of the northern counties. He had another wife, however, in this city, on whose family, it is calculated he has spent during the past three years, upwards of $20,000.

It is difficult to imagine how a man, with so little claim to confidence as Boyd possessed, should have succeeded, as he has done, in obtaining the confidence of gentlemen of respectability and wealth. But he certainly did succeed, and must have wasted an immense amount of money within a short time.

It is but proper to state, that since the 1st of January last, Mr. Boyd has not had any connection with the Towanda Bank.

Wonderful Escape.

During the late freshet on the Mohawk the lives of more than one person were in imminent danger. One of these persons was saved from almost instant death miraculously. The river was full of timber floating down with the roaring current, and the mass of water as well as the accumulation of timbers soon grew to be so powerful as to sweep everything away before them. During its mad career, the freshet came to Miller's bridge, a part of which instantly lodged under water. John McGee, a young man of great daring, made an extraordinary leap, and succeeded in saving himself.

Unfortunately Mr. George Woodford was upon the sinking end of the bridge, and in imminent danger of being crushed. With great presence of mind, in an instant, he threw off his overcoat, sprang into the water, passing entirely beneath the timbers, and not rising to the surface until he had passed both bridges. Not having been able to free himself from his boots and other garments, he became much exhausted by this wonderful feat; but at this moment he secured floating planks, and placing himself upon them, was carried down the stream at a rapid rate near half a mile, when his raft struck upon a quantity of lodged brush and flood wood. On this pile he endeavored to save himself; but in getting upon it, he lost his planks.

The horror of his situation, says the Utica Observer, may be imagined. Midnight darkness prevailed—he was in the midst of a rapid current, surrounded by floating ice, and a heavy rain was beating his bare head—he feels the pile beneath him giving way—in a moment all dissolved, and again he is compelled to swim for life. Becoming greatly chilled, he finds his strength fast failing him—he is borne down by the flood—one effort and Parker of the spot, gained the stream difficultly he reaches it, and climbs into its branches. Here he commenced calling loudly for assistance, and fortunately was heard by Mr. Rogers and others who were in search. Lights and a boat were procured, and Mr. W. was rescued from his perilous situation. Seldom is recorded so remarkable an escape from death.

Awful Suicide.

We are called on to record another melancholy death, arising from a Bank defalcation. We allude to the suicide of John G. Boyd, who has, of late, been extensively known as the Cashier of the Towanda Bank. The U. S. Gazette gives the following account of the causes which led to this shocking crime.

He had become indebted to the Penn Township Bank in a large amount, for which ample collateral security was held, but on Wednesday, it was deemed important that he should be arrested on the suit of that institution, and accordingly, Mr. Saunders, the Sheriff's officer, proceeded to a house in Schuylkill Seventh below Vine st., and took him into custody. Mr. Boyd proceeded through a part of the city with the officer, and saw several persons. We at the office of William L. Hirst, Esq. the attorney for the Bank. He was also at the Bank, and went thence to the office of his counsel, C. Gaillon, Esq. whence he departed early on Thursday morning, returning, by his request, to the House in Schuylkill Seventh street. There, having packed up his clothes, and burnt some papers, he returned to the officer, when he mentioned that he had left something. He went up stairs, and shot himself with a pistol, which he had carried in his pocket. He lingered until about nine o'clock on Thursday, and died, making no explanation that we could hear of touching his recent acts.

The act was committed by placing the pistol in his mouth. The ball passed through his head, and lodged in the vertebra.

Boyd had distinguished himself, before this unfortunate connection with the Towanda Bank, by some transactions, which drew upon him suspicions of bad intentions. But within a year or two, he seems to have managed to win the confidence, and spread the money, of men who, it might be supposed, would not easily be deceived.

Boyd was a married man, and had one family, we believe, in one of the northern counties. He had another wife, however, in this city, on whose family, it is calculated he has spent during the past three years, upwards of $20,000.

It is difficult to imagine how a man, with so little claim to confidence as Boyd possessed, should have succeeded, as he has done, in obtaining the confidence of gentlemen of respectability and wealth. But he certainly did succeed, and must have wasted an immense amount of money within a short time.

It is but proper to state, that since the 1st of January last, Mr. Boyd has not had any connection with the Towanda Bank.

Too Much Talking.

Miss Abigail Folsom has been harangueing the Massachusetts Legislature from the gallery. She seems to think that one person has as good a right as another to talk, and that a seat on the floor of the house or the privilege of wearing a coat has nothing to do with the matter. The Boston Advertiser gives the following account of her "holding forth."

"Miss Abigail Folsom attempted to speak on the Williams College Resolve, in the House of Representatives, yesterday, in character of a friend of humanity. The authoritatives cry of the Speaker, who called for "Order in the House," and, possibly the general laughter of members, subdued her, and she immediately sat down. The courteous and urbane Sergeant-at-arms at once went into the gallery, and informed her that if she said anything else which could be heard on the floor of the House, an officer, whom he placed next her, would immediately lead her out, by force if necessary. Miss Folsom took the information in the kindest possible manner, and said no more through the session, except in private conversation. She expressed her views to some gentlemen who conversed with her subsequently, on the freedom of speech and freedom of the press, but the officer, who sat by her through the day, was not obliged to exercise the power put into his hands."

Trouble in Eastern Texas.

A few weeks ago says the N. O. Picayune, we published a chapter, giving the particulars of the troubles between the "Regulators" and "Moderators" in Shelby county, Texas. After a few days' war, during which thirty or forty men were massacred, peace was proclaimed. Recent advices, we are sorry to say, announce the renewal of the difficulties. The Red Lander, published at St. Augustine, of the 13th ult. gives us the following items:

During the early part of the campaign, a man named Humphreys was taken by one of the parties, and severely whipped for stealing horses. Afterwards, it appears, he was charged with being one of the persons concerned in the murder of C. W. Jackson. He was again taken in the same party, carried to Logansport, and hanged, as it stated, for that offence. It appears there is but little doubt about the guilt of Humphreys, in relation to the horse stealing, and it is quite probable he may also have been engaged in the outrage upon Jackson and Lower.

A Coal Mine.

Caracccas papers, received by the Journal of Commerce, describe an immense coal mine recently discovered near Porto Cabello. The following is the language of one of the papers—

"There is nothing to be compared with it. The coal lies at the surface; and extends its huge veins over an immense space; it borders the sea five leagues; and its quality is acknowledged by engineers, to be superior to the best English. So vast a mine has never been seen before; and its veins, 3 or 4 yards in diameter, and of an infinite number, have surprised all who have seen them."

A schooner is constantly engaged in conveying coal from the mine to Porto Cabello, and it is expected that others will be added. The Governor of Curacoa has given orders for a quantity of this coal for the use of the steamer of war pertaining to the Colony. Orders have also been received from St. Thomas, Trinidad, and other places.

New Mode of Distributing Books.

The Rev. Mr. Caswell, missionary in Siam, has distributed many children's Tracts to children receiving instruction in the houses of the priests connected with the annexed or temples. At fourteen of these were he found on an average forty boys each who could read; and the priests not only countenanced their receiving the books, but begged hard for them themselves. Frequently he had given books to boys who, though entirely naked could read fluently. On one occasion two boys ran up to him for books, without a particle of clothing, and covered with the mud of the canal. They could not take them in their muddy hands—so he told them to open their mouths, and inserting the corner of a Tract between the teeth of each, they scampered away as fast as they could.

Watchmen Turned Burglars.

The New York Courier states that officers Hilliker and Parker of the upper police, arrested on Saturday, two city watchmen named John Sinclair, and John Kennedy, of the 3d District Watch, charged with having burglariously entered and robbed the stores of Messrs. Cutter & Co. and John Hays. Sinclair had been for several months a cartman in the employ of Messrs. Cutter & Co. and thus had greater facilities for accomplishing his ends. The worthy pair had done business on so large a scale, that they had rented a store, where they kept their plunder—and, strange as it may seem, the officers found a large amount of the property still in the store, which had been stolen; for which owners are wanted. They were both fully committed for trial.

The Steamer President.

We mentioned, last week, that a portion of the hull of the President had been seen at sea. Further vestiges of this ill-fated craft have since been discovered. The schooner Mokins, at New York, from Cape de Verde, reports that the stern-boat of the ill-fated steamship President, and some of her water-casks, had been picked up by a vessel and carried into St. Nicholas. One way of accounting for the floating of these articles is, that the ship when foundered carried down her boats, (which were lashed on deck) and of course the water-casks, which were under decks, and that by some great commotion of the ocean the wreck had been broken up and they floated out.

###

SATURDAY POST.

Terms of Subscription, &c.

$3 per annum—$2 if paid in advance; $1.25 in advance or six months.

Postmasters are requested to frank their letters addressed to us. The word "free" of itself is not a frank.

Agents will please enclose their letters with their names or initials.

Other letters will not be taken from the Post office unless the postage is paid.

Papers discontinued only at the end of the current half year's subscription, and then only at the option of the Publisher if arrearages are due.

Small Bank Notes of solvent Banks received in payment for our bills.

Agents are earnestly solicited to make quick remittances, without which it is difficult to keep accounts correct. They should always give names and post offices.

Any person forwarding Ten Dollars current, free of postage, in advance, will be entitled to six copies.

Removals must always state the Post-office removed from, as well as to which the paper is to be addressed.

Congressional News.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9, 1842.

SENATE.—After the usual preliminary business, the Senate resumed the resolutions offered by Mr. King, to limit the Congressional term to a definite duration of time, and agreed to make the subject the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. Clay's resolution proposing to amend the Constitution so as to limit the veto power, was then called up, when Mr. Archer, who was entitled to the floor, spoke at length in favor of the resolution.

When he had finished, Mr. Moorhead rose and said he had something to say on the subject, which he would do on Monday next.

The Senate then adjourned. It may be well here to remark that Mr. Clay's resolution embraces three limitations as follows:

1st. To restrict the veto power. 2d. To take from the Executive the power to appoint the Secretary of the Treasury and the Treasurer, and vest it exclusively in the two Houses of Congress. 3d. To prevent the appointment of members of Congress to civil office under the authority of the United States, from and during the time for which they are elected.

HOUSE.—Messrs. Gilmer, Hunter, Austin, Proffit, Johnson were excused from further service on the Committee of Foreign Affairs.

The resolution reported from the Committee on Manufactures, asking power to send for persons to give evidence on the tariff question, was then taken up, and after a few remarks from Mr. Wood, was laid over till to-morrow.

The pension appropriation bill, and the bill for the protection of our seamen abroad, were read a third time and passed; after which the House adjourned.

SENATE.—The session commenced this morning with the reception of Reports from the War and Navy Departments, in answer to Resolutions of the Senate.

Mr. Choate presented a memorial from Massachusetts, remonstrating against any interference with the Bankrupt Law.

Mr. Wright, of New York, presented a memorial in relation to the Wateshaqua Indians.

Several reports were received from the Bending Committees, but all of a private nature.

A resolution was presented, asking for the expenses of the New York Custom House commission, and the reason why the Commissioners first appointed did not make a report.

The introduction of this last resolution occasioned some little discussion. Mr. Clay said if there was ever an office which required examination, it was the New York Custom House.

Mr. Pierce, of N. H., (the author of the resolution of inquiry) said that the Senator from Kentucky would not go further has he would go in the work of retrenchments and reform.

Mr. Woodbury wished to exculpate himself from all blame in the expense of the expenses of the New York Custom House during the late Administration, and the one preceding it, because the duties had not outstripped the increase of labor.

Mr. Clay said that for the present, as the resolutions called only for the expenses of the Commission, and as he promised the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. Pierce) he would not engage in any inferences he would move to lay the subject upon the table.

Mr. Pierce had no objection.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of bills in relation to the Land Claims of Missouri. They were called up on motion of Mr. Benton, who gave notice of his intention to leave the city this evening for his home. The Senate, with great disinclination, adhered to the wishes of the Senator, and then proceeded to consider a bill to confirm the Land Claims to certain lands in Lexington.

The bill was ordered to an engrossment, when the Senate took up a bill to establish the States of Arkansas, Mississippi and Louisiana to constitute motion to test the validity of certain Land Claims in those States.

This bill was the one contested with much spirit one day during the past week.

Between three and four o'clock the bill was passed to an order for engrossment, by a vote of 26 to 17.

During the morning hour the Clerk of the House of Representatives appeared at the bar of the Senate with the Pension bill, and the bill making provisions for the relief of indigent American Seamen abroad.

The bills had their first and second readings and were referred, on motion of the chairman of the committee on Finance, to that committee.

Mr. Evans gave notice that he should ask for action on the bills at some early day, as their passage was necessary at once. The Senate closed with an Executive session.

HOUSE.—When the Journal was read it recorded the names of the following gentlemen as those of them who yesterday resigned their posts in the committee of Foreign Relations: Messrs. R. A. Cooper, J. D. White, Chapman, Sheppard, and J. D. Holmes, of South Carolina.

Arrangements were made on all sides to get in resolutions, and Mr. Filmore, who always, in sailor phrase, "keeps an eye to windward" for business, moved that the House go into committee of the whole, but the unfinished business was hastily called for, and this was the means of Mr. Williams to lay the resolution offered by the committee of manufactures, on the table. A call of the House was ordered and one hundred and sixty three members answered to their names, the absentees were called, and one hundred and seventy-six answered. Excuses for absent members were tendered and received.

The yeas and nays were then taken upon the motion to lay on the table, and the motion carried 120 nays 79, the motion was carried.

A resolution, heretofore offered by Mr. Stanley that the committee on public expenditure be allowed to employ a clerk was called up by the gentleman, and the yeas and nays demanded upon its passage.

On motion of Mr. Fillmore, the House went into Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union. Mr. Briggs was called to the chair. The Civil and Diplomatic Bill was then taken up, and read by clauses.

The clause appropriating $22,000 for the pay of clerks of the House (clerks to committees) Mr. Vinton, who moved to amend it by striking out $12,000, instead of $22,000. Mr. C. said that two clerks were employed in this report, and he was at a reason why they should be.

Mr. Fillmore said that there was no authority of law for their employment, and it was for this alone that the amendment was made.

Mr. Gentry moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from further consideration of the bill, and that it be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means with instructions to strike out certain clauses, which he stated he proposed to offering himself.

After some conversation by Messrs. Everett, Fillmore, Gentry, and the Speaker, as to whether the motion was in order—

The Speaker decided that the motion being made, it could not be received except by suspension of the rules.

Mr. Gentry moved a suspension of the rules to make this motion.

Pending which, the House adjourned.

SENATE.—The only important business transacted in the Senate was the reception of a message from Mr. A. Butler as First Comptroller of the Treasury. This was done by a rule of 43 in 7. The Bill for the relief of the Sufferers by the Explosion of the Steamboat Lexington, and the resolution was laid upon the table.

HOUSE.—When the Journal was concluded, communications were received from Messrs. M. A. Cooper, Chapman and Holmes, asking to be excused from serving on the Committee of Foreign Affairs for the same reasons that were assigned by those whose places they filled. The House excused them almost nem. con.

Mr. Everett then moved a suspension of the rules in order to take up his resolution, which assigns to morrow, for taking up the Appropriation Bill, and to suspend the rules for ever until the 23d inst. which all debate, discussion and amendments to be voted upon.

Mr. E. defended the rule and made on his motion which were ordered, and nays stood 102 to 124.

The rest of the morning was occupied in the presentation of petitions. There was nothing remarkable in any of them, but it was remarkable that the House sat so quietly and that the conclusion never was mentioned.

Mr. Adams presented a memorial which praised the House for abandon the remarkable action of Mr. Mitchell's resolution of thanks, and congratulated the House on its superior sphere of their duties, but the House declined receiving the tribute.

Mr. Rencher presented a memorial from the citizens of Nashville, Tennessee, to Louisiana, before the House adjourned.

SENATE.—The Senate met in session to a late hour last evening, on the resolution of Mr. Pierce, in relation to the New York Custom House, and disposed of the subject by a motion to lay upon the table, which prevailed by a vote of 31 to 12.

The President at the Senate laid before the Senate a message from the War Department in relation to the Topographical Department.

Mr. Tallmadge presented a memorial from citizens of Troy, New York, asking that the pay of members of Congress be reduced to five dollars per diem and asking also that the mileage be reduced to $10 for every one hundred miles. The memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Among the resolutions offered were some of great importance in reference to public questions by Mr. Clay of Kentucky. The two following will attract the great attention now in the course of agitation in the country. The rule claims that the retrenchment of the year ought to be equal to the expenditures of the year, and they declare also that there should be a revenue greater than 20 per cent. and yet that there would be no violation of the compromise act in its imports. A general provisions.

Mr. Clay said he had no wish to act upon the subject at this time, and he introduced the resolutions now only for the purpose of bringing the subject to the attention of the Senate, and gave of bringing the subject to the attention of the Senate, and gave notice of a day for their consideration. The resolutions being read, Mr. Clay moved Thursday week for their consideration.

Mr. Calhoun said that the resolutions were all of great importance. They made war upon the Compromise Bill and interfered with great and established questions. He hoped therefore, that when the resolutions were taken up, they would be considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Clay was not disposed to enter upon the consideration of the resolutions at this time. When the subject came up he would endeavor to show that the resolutions, if carried out, did not violate the spirit of the Compromise Act.

The day of consideration was then agreed upon without opposition, and the Resolutions were ordered to be printed.

A new subject now came before the Senate in the form of the Resolution fixing the last day of May for the adjournment of the two Houses of Congress.

The resolution was then debated very briefly, advocated by Mr. King, Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Henderson, and opposed by Mr. Clay as improper at this time and in the present state of public business. The Resolution was then laid on the table by a vote of 19 to 17.

After some other unimportant public business, the Senate from Missouri asked for the action of the Senate upon the Bill introduced by him to postpone the operation of the Bankrupt Law until the first of July.

Mr. Benton said that he only wished for a test vote upon the subject, and did not contemplate any thing further.

The Bill was then considered in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. Without debate it was reported to the Senate, and the question coming up on the engrossment of the Bill,

Mr. Rives very briefly stated his reasons for opposing the Bill. These reasons were that the action of the Senate had been given and was known upon this subject. He had voted against the Bill originally, and voted for the repeal of the Bill at this session. He now held himself ready to vote for any amendments which might be introduced or for a repeal of the Bill.

Mr. R. said he had not been convinced of the propriety of the Law in any thing he had heard in its favor but it was time the public mind was heated in regard to that question; and that it might be so, he should vote against postponement. The yeas and nays were then ordered upon the engrossment, and were as follows:—

Yeas—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Fulton, Graham, King, Lion, McRoberts, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, Woodbury, Wright, Young—22.

Nays—Messrs Barrow, Bates, Berrien, Choate, Clay, Clayton, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Moorhead, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Rives, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Talmadge, White, Woodbridge—23.

And so the Bill was lost.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the orders of the day, being the resolutions of Mr. Clay proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, with a view mainly to the restriction of the Veto power.

Mr. Moorhead, of Ky. was entitled to the floor and addressed the Senate in reply to the arguments of Mr. Preston and Mr. Buchanan, both of whom advocated the existence of the power, and opposed the proposed amendments of the Committee.

The Senator from Kentucky discussed the whole question in general and in detail, and took up the arguments of the two Senators opposing the bill, one by one.

Mr. Moorhead addressed the Senate until a quarter to four, and then closed.

Mr. Berrien has just moved an Executive session.

HOUSE.—A motion was made to print 3000 extra copies of the Report of the Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. Thompson moved an amendment, making the number to 3000, and the House agreed thereto.

Mr. Underwood tried, in vain, to get up his modification of the Charter of the Bank of the Metropolis, but the attempt was not accommodating.

The Speaker then called for the business of the morning hour, which was the consideration of his Report upon the organization of the officers of the House, and all the expenses connected with the police and other regulations of the House. The only material alteration which he proposed consisted in the general arrangement is to strike off two clerks, who each have $1000 per annum.

Mr. Bennett very succinctly stated the grounds upon which this and other changes were made, and was succeeded by

Mr. Gordon who moved an amendment to the report, placing back the two clerks, in which he was supported by

Mr. W. C. Johnson who declared, of his own knowledge, that the duties of the clerks of the House were more onerous than those of any person employed by the Government.

The debate was continued, until the expiration of the morning hour by Messrs. Wise, Briggs Chaudler, and Gordon.

Mr. Everett submitted a resolution with regard to considering the Appropriation Bill, which was read for information only.

Several communications were read from the President and Secretaries in answer to a resolution of the House.

One from the President was in answer to the call for correspondence between the Minister to England (Mr. Stevenson), and Com. Hull.

Mr. Adams moved that the bill be printed.

Another from the Secretary of War respecting the cost of the Military Road in the State of Arkansas.

Mr. Fessenden moved that this be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The bill to establish a national district in the State of Alabama was taken up, and the amendment of the Senate to the same agreed to.

The bill to extend the time of the Collection another year of suspension was taken up, and a motion made to lay it on the table. The yeas and nays were called, and were ayes 78, nays 107.

The previous question, which had been moved, was sustained without division, and the main question ordered in like manner upon the engrossment of the Bill for the relief of indigent seamen and stood thus—ayes 97, nays 73. So the Banks will deal, (as far as this House can give them the privilege) in depreciated paper for another year.

Mr. Gentry moved when the Appropriation Bill came up that it be recommitted with instructions to report it again, omitting every item of appropriation not authorized by law.

Mr. Wise made a few remarks, contending that the resolution of the House, in matters connected with its own effects were, in fact, the—recognized usage of the Government. The previous question was then moved, the main question ordered and upon the motion to lay on the table and nays were taken, and resulted in ayes, 144, nays 29.

The House then adjourned at 3 o'clock.

Legislative News.

HARRISBURG, Feb. 9, 1842.

SENATE.—In the Senate this morning, the Resumption Bill from the House was taken up and passed through Committee of the Whole without any opposition.

The Secretary of the Commonwealth presented the annual report of the State Geologist, which was referred to the Committee on Education.

Two messages were received from the Governor, informing the Senate that he has signed the bill relative to the Chester, Dauphin and Philadelphia Turnpike, and the bill to divide the District of Germantown.

The Auditor General transmitted to the Senate a tabular statement of the affairs of the Banks of this State.

Mr. McCully presented a number of petitions in favor of repealing the salary of the Recorder of Philadelphia.

HOUSE.—Mr. Stanton introduced a resolution for the appointment of a Curator of Wood in Philadelphia.

Mr. McCahen introduced a bill to incorporate the Kensington Gas Company.

Mr. Shoemaker introduced a bill to incorporate the American Insurance Company of North America.

Mr. Sharpe moved, offered the following:

Whereas, it is reported that the Legislature of this Commonwealth, in regard to the Banks, has been influenced by bribery and corruption, and it is important to the character of the State that so serious a charge should be fully investigated, in order that if found evident the guilty parties may be visited, stated from the unusual charge that lies upon them, of true, that the character may be distinguished from the guilty.

Therefore,

Resolved, &c. That a joint committee consisting of two Senators and three Representatives be appointed, whose duty it shall be to investigate and report whether any corrupt means have been used to influence the passage of the Bank bill, or any of these directly or indirectly for the purpose of influencing the action of the Legislature, or any other department of the Government of the Commonwealth in regard to any legislation for the Banks, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

On this Resolution a debate several hours arose and after being so amended as to restrict the committee from going back further than the year 1836, it passed and was referred. Mr. Wood, Lowry, and Dillard were appointed on the part of the House.

HARRISBURG, Feb. 10, 1842.

SENATE.—After petitions had been presented, a number of unimportant bills were reported.

Mr. Gibbons then moved to refer the Resumption Bill to a Select Committee.

The motion gave rise to some debate, when Mr. Ewing offered to amend the motion so that the Senate take up the bill on second reading immediately. Several other amendments were offered and rejected, and the motion discussed at great length, when Mr. Gibbons' motion prevailed by a vote of 15 to 14 and Messrs. Gibbons, Sullivan and Palmer, appointed the committee.

The Senate then took up and passed without debate, the resolution from the House authorizing the appointment of a committee to investigate the alleged charges of corrupt means being used to influence the action of the Legislature in relation to the Banks.

The supplement to the act relative to the District Court of Philadelphia, passed Committee of the Whole.

The report of the Committee on Claims pending yesterday came up in order and was amended so as instruct the Committee on Finance to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill for the settlement of the accounts of our Domestic creditors, and passed.

The bill incorporating the York and Cumberland Rail road coming up was postponed till to morrow.

HOUSE.—Mr. Fulton reported a bill to incorporate the Kensington and Spring Garden Gas Company.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the Judiciary Committee were discharged from the further consideration of the situation of the Girard Fund and the subject referred to a Select Committee with power to visit Philadelphia and send for persons and papers.

Mr. Hancock gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill to repeal the law establishing the Court of General Sessions.

The bill relative to the Auditor General, providing for ascertaining the collection of taxes by assessors, except so far as relates to those assessments, passed final reading.

HARRISBURG, Feb. 11, 1842.

SENATE.—Mr. Stewart from the committee to whom the bill had been referred the petition for repeal of the law authorizing appropriations for public works reported adversely to the resolution to repeal same.

The bill authorizing the Auditor General to settle the accounts of the engineers on the unfinished lines of canal, passed committee of the whole.

The bill to incorporate the York and Cumberland Railroad company, was then taken up and the first section having been read.

Mr. Stephens took the floor and addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill and was therefore in favor of the Mexican Ewing and Fleming in its favor, when the vote on the last section being taken resulted as follows: Ye. 18, nays 14.

The Secretary of the Commonwealth being introduced presented a message from the Governor, accompanied by a statement from the Directors of the Bank of Pennsylvania, setting forth the reasons why they were unable to pay the interest on the first inst.

The bill supplementary to the act incorporating the Hamburg, Allentown, Bethlehem and Easton Railroad company, was finally passed.

HOUSE.—Mr. Karns of Allegheny, offered the following:

Whereas the recent conduct of the members of congress, has been such as to forgive their constituents.

Therefore,

Resolved, &c. That a committee of safety of three members be appointed by the Speaker, to whom shall be referred all bills that shall be to repeal to the city of Washington, and remain during the session, and to report from time to time, their opinion thereon on the table.

On motion of Mr. Heckman, the Canal Commissioners and the Auditor General, were required to furnish to the House a statement of the original cost of the several lines of canal, and their cost to the State respectively, together with the amount of tolls received upon them. Also the annual new due on the Erie Extension and North Branch canal.

The resolution asking of Congress an appropriation, to improve the mouth of the Susquehanna, passed finally.

HARRISBURG, Feb. 12, 1842.

SENATE.—Mr. Gibbons from the Select Committee to whom the Resumption Bill from the House was referred, reported a Bill providing for an immediate resumption of specie payments.

The motion to print 100 additional copies of this bill, which finally prevailed, gave rise to much debate, which gave evidence that the bill will meet with much opposition in the Senate. Mr. Ewing said much so he was opposed to the other bill, he looked upon this as one still worse in its character.

The bill was then ordered to be printed, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE.—Mr. Hiestand presented a Memorial from the Commonwealth, and stating that the bank of Chambersburg had refused to comply with the requisitions of the Governor and recommending that the charter of the Bank be forfeited.

HOUSE.—3000 copies in English and 1500 in German, of the report of the State Geologist, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Bonnell reported a bill for the improvement of the West Branch of the Susquehanna.

Mr. Hancock offered a resolution suspending the work on the Insane Asylum, until further legislative action, which was adopted.

HARRISBURG, Feb. 14, 1842.

SENATE.—Almost nothing worth recording to-day. To-morrow I apprehend the case will be different, as the Bank Bill will be in order. The Senate met at half past ten, and adjourned at one.

HOUSE.—Nothing of any general nature arose, and after being so amended as to restrict the committee from going back further than the year 1836, it passed and was referred. Mr. Wood, Lowry, and Dillard were appointed on the part of the House.

HARRISBURG, Feb. 10, 1842.

SENATE.—After petitions had been presented, a number of unimportant bills were reported.

Mr. Gibbons then moved to refer the Resumption Bill to a Select Committee.

The motion gave rise to some debate, when Mr. Ewing offered to amend the motion so that the Senate take up the bill on second reading immediately. Several other amendments were offered and rejected, and the motion discussed at great length, when Mr. Gibbons' motion prevailed by a vote of 15 to 14 and Messrs. Gibbons, Sullivan and Palmer, appointed the committee.

The Senate then took up and passed without debate, the resolution from the House authorizing the appointment of a committee to investigate the alleged charges of corrupt means being used to influence the action of the Legislature in relation to the Banks.

The supplement to the act relative to the District Court of Philadelphia, passed Committee of the Whole.

The report of the Committee on Claims pending yesterday came up in order and was amended so as instruct the Committee on Finance to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill for the settlement of the accounts of our Domestic creditors, and passed.

The bill incorporating the York and Cumberland Rail road coming up was postponed till to morrow.

HOUSE.—Mr. Fulton reported a bill to incorporate the Kensington and Spring Garden Gas Company.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the Judiciary Committee were discharged from the further consideration of the situation of the Girard Fund and the subject referred to a Select Committee with power to visit Philadelphia and send for persons and papers.

Mr. Hancock gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill to repeal the law establishing the Court of General Sessions.

The bill relative to the Auditor General, providing for ascertaining the collection of taxes by assessors, except so far as relates to those assessments, passed final reading.

HARRISBURG, Feb. 11, 1842.

SENATE.—Mr. Stewart from the committee to whom the bill had been referred the petition for repeal of the law authorizing appropriations for public works reported adversely to the resolution to repeal same.

The bill authorizing the Auditor General to settle the accounts of the engineers on the unfinished lines of canal, passed committee of the whole.

The bill to incorporate the York and Cumberland Railroad company, was then taken up and the first section having been read.

Mr. Stephens took the floor and addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill and was therefore in favor of the Mexican Ewing and Fleming in its favor, when the vote on the last section being taken resulted as follows: Ye. 18, nays 14.

The Secretary of the Commonwealth being introduced presented a message from the Governor, accompanied by a statement from the Directors of the Bank of Pennsylvania, setting forth the reasons why they were unable to pay the interest on the first inst.

The bill supplementary to the act incorporating the Hamburg, Allentown, Bethlehem and Easton Railroad company, was finally passed.

HOUSE.—Mr. Karns of Allegheny, offered the following:

Whereas the recent conduct of the members of congress, has been such as to forgive their constituents.

Therefore,

Resolved, &c. That a committee of safety of three members be appointed by the Speaker, to whom shall be referred all bills that shall be to repeal to the city of Washington, and remain during the session, and to report from time to time, their opinion thereon on the table.

On motion of Mr. Heckman, the Canal Commissioners and the Auditor General, were required to furnish to the House a statement of the original cost of the several lines of canal, and their cost to the State respectively, together with the amount of tolls received upon them. Also the annual new due on the Erie Extension and North Branch canal.

The resolution asking of Congress an appropriation, to improve the mouth of the Susquehanna, passed finally.

HARRISBURG, Feb. 12, 1842.

SENATE.—Mr. Gibbons from the Select Committee to whom the Resumption Bill from the House was referred, reported a Bill providing for an immediate resumption of specie payments.

The motion to print 100 additional copies of this bill, which finally prevailed, gave rise to much debate, which gave evidence that the bill will meet with much opposition in the Senate. Mr. Ewing said much so he was opposed to the other bill, he looked upon this as one still worse in its character.

The bill was then ordered to be printed, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE.—Mr. Hiestand presented a Memorial from the Commonwealth, and stating that the bank of Chambersburg had refused to comply with the requisitions of the Governor and recommending that the charter of the Bank be forfeited.

HOUSE.—3000 copies in English and 1500 in German, of the report of the State Geologist, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Bonnell reported a bill for the improvement of the West Branch of the Susquehanna.

Mr. Hancock offered a resolution suspending the work on the Insane Asylum, until further legislative action, which was adopted.

HARRISBURG, Feb. 14, 1842.

SENATE.—Almost nothing worth recording to-day. To-morrow I apprehend the case will be different, as the Bank Bill will be in order. The Senate met at half past ten, and adjourned at one.

HOUSE.—Nothing of any general nature arose, and after being so amended as to restrict the committee from going back further than the year 1836, it passed and was referred. Mr. Wood, Lowry, and Dillard were appointed on the part of the House.

General News.

FIGHTING IN VENEZUELA—FURTHER PARTICULARS.—The New Orleans Bulletin of the 4th says:—Capt. Attwood, of the British brigantine Breeze, from Kingston, Jamaica, whence she sailed on the 24th ult., states that two days previous to his departure, news was received from Carthagena. In consequence of some outrages upon British subjects and their property by Caracoas, the leader of the revolters, under pretence of enforcing his blockade, several persons were flogged and taken out to be shot, and several vessels plundered. The Charybdis brig of war was ordered to sail from Carthagena coming up on the engagement of the 5th, on her arrival at Carthagena she was fired upon from two Carthagenian brigs of war, and several gun-boats, &c. The Charybdis thereupon cast anchor and commenced her defence; and the result of the action was, that the two Venezulian ships were sunk, and the Admiral, with a large number of men, killed. The Charybdis lost four men killed in the engagement, and was considerably injured in her upper works.

A TEXAN SHIPPING ON BOARD AN AMERICAN VESSEL.—A letter received at New York, under date of Campeachy, January 27th, states that on the 12th ult. the Texan ship Austin, sent thirty armed men on board the American barque Louisa, Baker, lying at Sisal, on the point of sailing for Vera Cruz with the representative of Yucatan to Mexico, the Mexican commissioners, and other passengers, the whole of whom were taken by force and carried on board the Austin as prisoners, notwithstanding the protest of Captain Baker. They were kept on board the Austin two days, and then liberated by order of Commodore Moore; after which they sailed in the Louisa for Vera Cruz.

FEMALES IN COAL MINES.—An English paper states that an effort is being made to "put an end to the practice of employing females in the disgusting and laborious drudgery of working in the collieries; the system is so fraught with crime and misery, that every well wisher to his fellow man, on becoming acquainted with the enormity of the evils attending the custom, must feel interested in its abolishment, as it tends not only to demoralize the unfortunate beings, whose degraded position subjects them to every possible degree of insult and injury, but, by removing woman from her proper element, deprives man of that enjoyment they are alone capable of adding to domestic arrangements."

A FORGERY.—The New York Express says that a "few days since, a gentleman, who was a silent partner of a firm, purchased a note purporting to be of his house, for twenty-five hundred dollars, having about four months to run, not doubting its being genuine. He paid the money without making any inquiries, and, on presenting the circumstance to his partners, he was told they had no note for that amount out, and on further investigation, the note was found to be a forgery. No trace of the forger could be found, but it put the note off to a broker, and who received the proceeds, has yet been discovered. The gentleman, however, got a good shave by the transaction."

CURRENCY IN INDIA.—At the "Home League" in New York a few days since, a statement was read by Dr. Fisher, in reference to the culture of cotton in India. He said that the "importation of cotton from India to England had increased from 73,587 bales in 1831, to 456,000 in 1841; with the prospect of an importation in 1842 of 600,000 bales. That the experiment of cultivating cotton to supply the British market by American skill and enterprise improved into India, and that the seed for improved staple, had fully succeeded, and that they were now extending their views to the cultivation of tobacco, rice and sugar, with every prospect of success."

NO STAY LAW IN VIRGINIA.—The Virginia House of Delegates a short time since, instructed one of its committees to report a bill for staying executions, &c. On Thursday the question came up before the House, on a motion for reconsideration, when the House, by a vote, then discharged the committee from the consideration of the subject by a vote of 79 to 44—thus deciding very properly against any stay law, which is another name for repudiation.

EAST INDIA SQUADRON.—On the 29th of September the ship Borneo, arrived at Holmes's Hole, spoke U. S. frigate Constellation, Commodore Kearney, and U. S. sloop-of-war Boston, Capt. Long, 23 days from Jonoe Island, one of the Canary Islands, on the coast of Africa bound to China, via Sumatra and Singapore. Officers and crew all well—one man had died on board the Boston, being the only death since leaving the United States.

A NOBLE PAIR.—The largest and handsomest yoke of oxen that we ever saw, says the New York Journal of Commerce, are now at the Tattersalls, on Broadway. They were raised by William Tousnard, Esq. of East Haven, Connecticut, and are six years old. The girth is weight 2815 pounds; the other weighs 2687 pounds; and their joint weight is 5482 pounds. This is 18 pounds less than two and three-fourths tons.

THE TEXIAN PRISONERS.—The New Orleans Courier thinks Vera Cruz Cruz Cemeor, of the 18th ult. On the 10th, the Texian prisoners were ordered to leave their prison, to sail in the public works. A physician was present, and examined them. At his suggestion, they were ordered back to prison, and two were sent to the hospital—two were permitted to work unfettered—all the rest were chained.

HOMICIDE.—A man named Vinega was shot at New Orleans on the 2d inst., by Bartholomew Commessa, a jeweller. The door of the latter was forced open twice during the night by two persons, and believing that an attempt was made to rob him, he fired a pistol, which came the second time, and killed one. On the other hand, it is said that the man was intoxicated, and only staggered against the door.

GREAT DEPTHS IN WELLS PUMP.—Mr. Truman Kilburn, of Middlebury, says the Rutland Vt. Herald, while cutting a hole in the ice on Wells Pond, dropped his axe through the hole where the water was 16½ deep. He threw off his clothes, dove through the hole where he cut the ice, and got the handle of his axe and threw it upon the ice. This was done last week.

CRIME IN PRUSSIA.—During twenty-three years, the capital convictions in Prussia, the Rhine Provinces excepted, amounted to 234 males, and 28 females, making a total of 312, or 13 per annum. The number of inhabitants is estimated at 10,000,000. Of these males were pardoned, and 63 females; thus there were only four executions to every three millions of souls.

BURGLARY IN MONTREAL.—On Friday night, the 4th inst., the jewellery store of Mr. Savage, in Montreal, was broken open and robbed of watches, &c., and a great quantity of valuable property abstracted. There were twenty-four gold and forty-nine silver watches among the property stolen. The whole loss is estimated at about eight thousand one hundred dollars.

THE RIGHT OF SEARCH.—The New Orleans Bulletin says:—"We learn that the ship Henry, at this port from Vera Cruz, was visited by an officer from an English vessel of war, who claimed several of the crew of the Henry as being British sailors. We further learn that the ship searching officer was lowered against his will into the boat and suffered to depart."

THE PRIESTS OF SPAIN.—It having been reported in Madrid that the Minister of Foreign Affairs was making arrangements to come to Mexico, where an asylum has been offered to them by the Mexican clergy, the minister of justice issued a decree forbidding their being considered as belonging to the regular clergy of Mexico.

THE FRENCH MINISTRY.—A letter from Paris to the New York Courier, says:—"I have no means to communicate, but shortly will like as it is almost certain that Guizot will be driven from office, and that Thiers and Molé will succeed him. The steamer of February or March will satisfy this prediction."

TEN THOUSAND PLEDGES.—The Cincinnati Chronicle says, that Mr. Porter has returned to that city from a tour through Missouri, Illinois, and Indiana; during which he has obtained about ten thousand signatures to the Washington pledge.

THE SMALL SCHOONER ARIEL, which was built last season at Medford, Mass. for the Texan Navy, and arrived off Java Head on 88 days from Boston—her smallest day's work being 60 miles and her best 254 miles.

ONE OF THE MEXICAN SCHOONERS LOST.—An arrival at New Orleans, on the 3d, confirms the account of the loss of the Mexican schooner Liberty, Captain Howland, built at New York, for the Mexican Government.

MILD WEATHER AT THE WEST.—The Columbus (Ohio) Journal speaks of the continued mild weather in that region. In the preceding week three barns were burnt by lightning in various parts of the State.

A WIFE AND MEEKS RECOVERED.—A wife who recently ran away with her paramour from Richmond, has arrived in Petersburg, after one or two ago, and $700 found upon the person of her seducer.

A MILL DESTROYED.—A planing and saw mill owned by Messrs. Rich & Hotchkiss, at New Haven, was burned on the 14th. Loss between four and five thousand dollars.

THE ELOPEMENT.—The friends of Miss Coughan have been invited by the ladies conducting the Seminary from which she ran away, to institute an investigation into the affair.

THE DEATH OF GRIMM.—Grimm, the patriot, whose seizure in Vermont, and imprisonment in Montreal, last fall, caused so much noise, died at Champlain on the 7th of Jan.

MELTON.—We learn from the Hartford, Conn., Courant, that a very splendid notice passed over that city on Saturday evening, apparently as large as a full moon.

THE HON. MARTIN VAN BUREN, Ex-President of the United States, it is intimated, intends shortly to pay a visit to General Jackson, in Tennessee.

THE WHALE FISHERY.—A company is about to be formed at Halifax, for the prosecution of the Whale Fishery.

THE RECEIPTS of the American Board of Missions, during the month of January, were over forty thousand dollars.

TEMPERANCE.—The Catholic Temperance Association of Albany, number upwards of 3500 members.

Financial Report.

Sales of Stocks.

By the Philadelphia Board of Brokers, for the week ending Thursday.

	Price sold for
211 shares Reading R. R.	10a19½
1 share Girard Bank	34
173 do. Mechanics Bank	12a12½
170 do. Phil. Wil & Balt. R. R.	14a15½
50 do. Cat. & Del. Navigation Bank	17½
50 do. Girard Bank	34
50 do. Western Bank	30
46 do. Penna. Railroad	45
45 do. United States Bank	3
35 do. Pittsburg Bank	30
30 do. Susquehanna Bank, Tenn.	30
15 do. North America Insurance Co.	28
15 do. North Bank Insurance Co.	42½a43
15 do. Planters Bank, Tenn.	60
11 do. Pennsylvania Bank	73
10 do. Commercial Bank	30
6 do. Northern Bank, Ky.	60
5 do. Mar. and Mechanics' Bank	10
3 do. Mechanics Bank	71
3 do. Mec & Mec Bank, Phila.	32
3 do. Philadelphia Bank	36
1 do. Penna Insurance Co.	170
$2000 United States Bank Notes	3
$1430 Girard Bank Notes	63a63

MORE BANK FRAUD INDICTMENTS.—We learn that George Ordine, Jr. (brother to the Teller of the Eagle Bank, and known in the Gambling Coffee Houses of the city & Co. Commission Leather Dealers, were on Wednesday indicted by the Grand Jury of Boston, upon matters growing out of the late defalcations of the Eagle Bank Tyler.

RESUMPTION IN OHIO.—The bill requiring the banks of Ohio to resume on the coming 4th of March, has passed the lower House of the State Legislature with some amendments, which will require the confirmatory action of the Senate. The belief in Cincinnati is that it will become a law.

SPECIE IN BOSTON.—The specie imported in Boston, during 1841, was—gold $172,764, silver $249,384—$372,148.

TENNESSEE.—The Senate have adopted resolutions requiring the Banks to resume specie payments by the 1st of January, 1843, after rejecting the House resolutions on the same subject.

A BANK FAILURE.—The bank of Hamilton, Ohio has made an assignment.

Political Intelligence.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT.—By and with the advice and consent of the Senate—Charge d'Affairs to Venezuela, of New York, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Spain.

Waddy Thompson, of South Carolina, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Mexico.

Wm. Blackford, of Virginia, to be Charge d' Affairs to New Granada.

William H. Freeman, of Philadelphia, to be Consul of the United States for the port of Nassau, in the Island of Cuba, in the place of John M. Baker, deceased.

SPECIAL ELECTION.—An election will be held on the 1st of March, to fill the place of Member to Congress from Bradford and Susquehanna Congressional district of this state, in the room of the Hon. Davis Dimock, deceased. Almon H. Read, Esq., is spoken of as the Democratic candidate.

Destructive Tornado in Ohio.

We learn from the Cleveland Herald that on the 4th inst. a destructive tornado passed over Mayfield, Newton, and other places, doing immense damage. At Newton, fifteen houses were blown down. Its effects at Mayfield were terrific; and, as the phenomenon is one which attracts the attention of scientific men, we copy the account:—

"The sweep of the tornado in Mayfield is described by an eye witness as frightfully terrific. Swift destruction marked its path; it moved forward like a block pitchy cloud, hugging the earth, and whirling high in air every substance drawn within its vortex. The largest forest trees were uprooted or twisted off like fragile shoots, and in some places even stumps were torn from the earth; half imbedded stones were lifted out, and large logs were moved off by wind power that would have required the strongest oxen to have started. Solid buildings were torn up and whirled away to the very foundations; and our informant mentioned an instance in which two men rushed from a barn said to be fast before the storm, and were literally tumbled end over end some distance by its fury. As the tornado crossed Chagrin river, the water was drawn from its bed and dashed upon the frame dwelling of Mr. Dean, located on the bank, with such resistless might as to sweep the house against a tree at some little distance, when it broke into fragments—many of which were borne away for miles. The family, consisting of six persons, in the house, cannot be found at all, all the escape of Mrs. D. and her children from instant death is a marvel of marvels. The church in Kirtland was moved round from its foundation some forty feet.

The tornado varied in width from fifty to one hundred rods, and lasted but a moment or two. The vivid recollection of its wrath will long remain with those who felt or witnessed it.

The occurrence of such a tornado, accompanied with thunder and lightning in this climate, in mid-winter, is a phenomenon worthy the attention and examination of the curious observers of atmospheric phenomena. What says the Storm King, Espy?"

A later number of the Herald, gives us less than thirty houses, barns and buildings, which have either been entirely demolished or very much shattered. Fortunately very little personal injury was received or lives lost

THE OLIO.

Variety's the spice of life.
That gives it all its flavor.

From the N. O. Picayune.

Mary Ann.

Mary Ann's a maiden gay,
And for her I weave a lay.
Mary Ann!
Mary has two eyes, and they
Serve for her to see her way.
Just as other maidens may.
Mary Ann!
Mary also has a nose,
And the tip she upward throws.
Mary Ann!
And she follows it, and knows
'Tis before her as she goes,
For 'tis bright couleur de rose.
Mary Ann!
Mary has a little hand,
That is just a little tann'd.
Mary Ann!
Mary Ann has got two feet
Which convey her thro' the street
In a way 'twere hard to beat.
Mary Ann!
She has also teeth and lips,
And she sun and coffee sips.
Mary Ann!
Then she wags a tongue about,
Has a mouth, beyond a doubt,
Which she couldn't do without
Mary Ann!
If you meet with Mary Ann,
You may catch her if you can,
Mary Ann!
If to catch her you should plan,
And should make yourself her man,
You'll be sorry you began
Mary Ann!
Mary isn't rich in dimples,
But she boasts of sundry pimples,
Mary Ann!
I have said she has two eyes,
Which she uses very wise,
As to see across the rose
Mary Ann!
She has also got a vision,
Not particularly choice,
Mary Ann!
But she uses it for speaking
In a manner shrilly creaking,
And she's very good at shrieking
Mary Ann!
She has also other graces,
Shining in their proper places,
Mary Ann!
Intellectuality
Of a certain quality,
She has in reality,
Mary Ann!
Therefore she has got a head,
Cover'd with a growth of red,
Mary Ann!
And it struggles like a thatch,
Over eyes and nose to match,
The best beauty in the batch
Mary Ann!
'Tis a picture most enchanting
But reality is wanting,
Mary Ann!
So your angles needs 't stretch,
To be made so queer a sketch,
For, 'tis only fancy's sketch,
Mary Ann! PHAZMA.

AN OLD MAN.—General O——, of Pennsylvania, was a perfect bundle of oddities—with some vices mixed up with many virtues, amongst which were not wanting great vivacity and presence of mind. Being at one time in Philadelphia, which he wished to leave the next morning, he found it necessary to ask some acquaintance then in the city, that night. Upon inquiry, he learned that his friend had gone with some company to a fashionable faro bank, somewhere in Dock street. General O—— set out in search, but not knowing the exact location of the house, he was somewhat embarrassed. He was unwilling to compromise the gravity of his person by making inquiries for such a place on the street. Observing a lad before him, the General accosted him——

"My lad, can you tell me where the——barber shop is?"

"The barber shop? yes sir, it is over there," pointing to it.

"That! you young rascal, that's not the barber shop!—that's the gambling house."

"No sir, it's not—the gambling house is there, where you see the lamp in the hall."

"O, I beg your pardon, my boy—I beg your pardon—here's a shilling for you."

ABOUT FOR NEW YEARS.—If you are not married make up your mind to become so this year. If you are not in love, get in—fall in—tumble in, as soon as possible. If you are—propose—propose. The girls are asking, "Why don't the men propose?" And don't take our refusal. The ladies have a shocking habit of saying no, when they mean, yes. They are fond of contradiction, and like to be supplicated. Accommodate them.

It is not good for man to be alone, nor woman either. A human being with no one to love—is a miserable being. Old maids and old bachelors are moral abortions. When a man gets married, he doubles his motives to exertion.

CHARACTER OF A SOT.—He is like a statue placed in moist air—all the lineaments of humanity are mouldered away, and there is nothing left of him but the rude lump of the shape of a man. He has drowned himself, as it were, in a butt of wine. He has swallowed his humanity and drank himself into a beast. He is like a spring tide, when he has drunk to water mark he swells and looks big, and overflows every thing that stands in his way. But when the drink within him is at ebb, he shrinks within his banks, and falls so slow and shallow that cattle may pass over him.

Song by an Oyster.

Love me when I live,
Eat me when I die.
What to me are pain or death,
So that then be nigh!
Once I squeeled each,
Now I'm growing poor,
Oh! what for thy dear sake
Could I not endure?
Even a sizzling roast,
Even a simmering stew,
Or in butter, I'd lean food,
Had it strengthen'd you.
Kiss me for my love,
Sorrow for my pain;
Come, and marrow in my shell
That then he're again.

HUNTING DEER.—The hunting deer are very curious; and I do not remember to have seen them in any other part of India. A large male antelope is trained to walk quietly among a herd of wild ones, one of the males of which immediately comes out to fight. The tame one, having rope twisted in a particular manner among his horns, soon manages to entangle his antagonist; and the moment he finds he has done so, he throws himself on the ground, and anchors the other until people come up and secure him.

RARE PHILOSOPHY.—He was a truly brave fellow that said—"Consider no man capable of insulting you who is mean enough to attempt it. In this you have the decided advantage. For whilst, by the insult he acknowledges you worthy of his notice, you, by your neglect, prove him unworthy of yours."

Such a man would make a better soldier in defence of any just cause, than the loudest swagger-er ever heard of.

TAKING IT COOL.—A couple of friends were riding out lately, near New Orleans, when the horse driven by one of them, became a little independent, and dashed off at a great rate, defying every effort to control him. "This is a gone case," said the one driving; "I can't begin to hold him; just hold me will you!" "O, never mind," and the other, very complacently, "I dare say we can run about as fast as the horse can run!"

HOMELY CONCENTRATED ADVERTISING.—A perfumer, of very classical proficiency, commences his advertisement thus—

"It was said of Attila, 'that on that spot where the hoofs of his courser struck the earth, no blades of grass ever grew again.' It may be said in a similar tone, that where 'Gouraud's Poudre Subtile' touch the skin, the hair vanishes from the place like magic."

TEMPERANCE.—A loafer once prompted never again to call for liquor at a bar. In order to evade the promise, he went into a tavern with a friend, then, according to agreement, asked him softly with what weapon David slew Goliah. He looked at the bar-keeper, and replied in a loud voice, "a sling!"

AN WIDE-ARE.—Province says, one Mr Aker, of the Indiana Senate, is seeking to immortalize himself by cutting off the newspapers of that State from the little income they derive from the publication of sheriff's sales. He is a sore Aker.

GOOD.—If your sister while tenderly engaged in a tender conversation with her sweetheart requests you to bring her a glass of water from the adjoining room, you can start on the errand, but you need not return. You will not be missed.

A COSTLY KISS.—A young gentleman in New York has been fined $5000 for abruptly taking a kiss from a young demoiselle. Why didn't the spooney give it back to her, and she wouldn't have said a word about it.

A MONKEY.—"What will de Frenchmen make next?" as the Dutchman said, the first time he ever saw a monkey.

From the Southern Literary Messenger.

The White Fawn:

A Tale of Western Virginia.

Yes, 't is a tale twice told—a tale of border life, woven with the incidents of early emigration to the West. But to me it is fresh and beautiful; for with it, crowd up the recollections of the trials of my ancestors, and, at the same time, of that other race, who, little more than half a century ago, claimed these territories as their own. Here, upon these grounds, which I now call my own, and which are smiling under a teeming harvest, the proud Indian warrior once walked, the sole proprietor. Here, his swift foot pursued the panting deer, and his sure arrow drank the blood of the beast of prey;—here, went up the loud cry of war; here, the death song; and here, when the shout of battle ceased, buried he under this venerable tree, the hatchet wiped from blood;—here, he smoked his pipe of peace; here, kindled up his council-fire. There, in that deep grove, the leave of a hundred scalps, gathered his children, with the young of his tribe, and recounted his deeds of prowess, and kindled in their breasts the flames of patriotism;—there, in that same retreat, the young chieftain "wooed his dusky maid," and drank the rapture of her deep dark eye. On the surface of yonder gently flowing stream, he paddled his light canoe. But alas! they are all gone: they left no historian to pen their story; no poet, to celebrate their achievements in song. For, gentlefolks almost complete, has passed over all they had, and the very traces of their being are almost gone.

"The plough is on their hunting grounds,
The white man's axe rings through their woods"

Reader! If the oft-repeated narratives of this hapless race have ceased to interest thee, thou needest not read further: for this is but a simple recital of a simple incident, connected with the early history of thy country's settlement. It introduces one of that proud class of beings, who, as we said before, had neither historian nor poet, of their own, to commit their names to the rolls of immortality: their sole memorials consist in the traditionary memoirs which our forefathers have related to us, when we gathered around them to hear of their border troubles.

The history of the settlements on our Western frontier is replete with the most thrilling incidents. It is not wonderful that it should be so; for it was there that the Indian stood upon his native strand, and endeavored to hold at bay the people who had already usurped a large share of his inheritance. It was there he made a desperate halt to oppose those approaches, and to check that rapacity which seemed to threaten the entire consumption of all that he possessed. In those scenes were displayed all the strength, greatness and ferocity of Indian character.

When this country was first visited by Europeans, they found its possessors kind, generous and unsuspecting, to a fault. They welcomed them as demigods, and received them with the openheartedness of brothers; but they had opened their bosom to warm the viper—they found, when it was too late, that it had struck its fangs deep; and that though the poison acted slowly, it would not cease until it had consumed the whole body. Before the eyes of the red man were open, the pale faces had obtained too firm a footing to be dislodged; and after a few fruitless efforts to maintain his home East of the mountains, he turned his eyes for the last time to the blue Atlantic, along whose shores he had so often lostered, listening to the roar of the surge, as the mighty voice of his father—the Great Spirit, and then turned his footsteps to the hunting-grounds of the immeasurable West. True, it was not without regret; for as one of these stricken but proud men gained the highest peak of the Alleghanies, he looked back, and the strong feelings of his strong soul were moved by his purpose; but the cracking of the yielding cedars, the shouts of the pursuing white, and the sight of the rifle in the hands of his foes, which seemed to chain him in portentous silence. It was the quiet of the soul, such as holds possession of it, while resolving on desperate and malicious projects—the calm which often precedes the angry surging of the human passions. She made a movement as if to rise; he started wildly from his reverie, and threw a glance at her which would have made a stouter heart quail; but his look relaxed its sternness, and approaching her, said, "does the White Fawn hope for pity? Once Vantappa knew what it was to pity; once, Vantappa was kind to all, and grew fierce only when his tribe went to battle; but the white man has torn all softness from his heart, and now he cannot pity even the White Fawn! Once, Vantappa would have slain his own men, had they raised the hatchet against a woman; but now he relents not, for the white man big in each other's society, they loved before they knew how to describe what love was. To George Benton, from his very boyhood, Agnes had ever seemed the most beautiful and lovely girl of all his acquaintance. Years passed by, and when an hour to have passed tediously, by, if she were at his side, or the companion of his sports. To Agnes, in turn, he had ever been the beau ideal of every thing that was excellent. No other boy possessed nobler sentiments; no other one was half so manly; none knew how to handle a rifle better, or to take better aim; to manage his horse more gracefully—to tell a tale or a joke with better effect than he—no one had a more generous soul or intellectual mind—in short, to do any thing as George Benton did it, was, or begun to be about this period, perfection.

But was this love? They did not think so. To be sure they had a sort of indefinite feeling, that some how or other they could not tell precisely how, their hearts seemed to be growing together. But neither the one nor the other had yet found a name for it. What was it then? It was but destiny, weaving about them the "web inseparate," which was to prove in time how indissolubly their being was united. Their affections were already so wedded, that their souls were e'en "one spirit within two frames—one passion in twin hearts."

How beautiful is love when it thus groweth! Like the vine that slowly and almost imperceptibly putteth forth tendril after tendril, grasping the object of its support, until it so winds itself around, that neither storm nor whirlwind can tear it away! So in first and early love, the offspring of youthful intimacy, heart unconscious of clingeth to heart, tedril knitteth to tendril, until time nor change nor chance, nor the keenest adversity, hath power to part them. Truly hath it been said that such love is the romance of the most romantic and happiest period of life. "Early loves, like the first run of the uncrushed grape, are the sweetest and strongest gushings of the heart."

'Tis true, that as the strength of manhood began to dignify the soul and manners of George, and as Agnes came blushing to the verge of womanhood, both had, at times, felt strangely. This was so, either when present or absent. George, as was natural, was the first to suspect that all was not the bare and simple friendship of youthful minds: he felt that there was a deeper, bolder feeling, and his manners toward her early began to vary, and to assume a tone of tenderness, there was also a singular embarrassment in her presence. Ever and anon

"his blood would ebb and flow,
And his cheek change tempestuously, his heart
Beating knowing of its cause of agony."

But he had begun to feel that all happiness, to him, was lost, unless she was the companion of his life; and in the analysis of this feeling, he found what men call Love. She, more simple, whilst she felt as deeply as he did, and was conscious that her being was wrapt up in his, had not dared to look so deeply into the unfathomable depths of the heart. She knew that a thrill went through her when they met; but here, woman-like, she hitered,—she dared not be sanguine; she was content with that vague feeling; or rather, she trusted not herself to ascertain its elements.

After an interval of uninterrupted quiet, the peace of the settlement was disturbed by the incursions of Indians. After destroying a number of cattle, and firing several barns, the author of these depredators had quietly decamped. The inhabitants, who but a little while before were congratulating themselves on the thought that they were entirely free from the annoyance of the tomahawk and unlooked-for inroad, and they determined to revenge the attack in such a signal manner as to prevent the possibility of its recurrence; in short, they resolved to scour the whole country, and if possible destroy every Indian. Every man that could draw trigger was called out to carry on this war of extermination,—the triumph was to be complete—the last drop of the blood of the already declining race of red men was to be poured out.

For a week the country around had been searched; several skirmishes had taken place; the Indians were every where routed, and many an old and aged veteran and several chiefs fell before the hate of their mortable foes.

Whilst these things were going on, there was one of this hunted people who suspected that extermination was the watchword. But the war-cry of Vantappa did not quake with fear! Secure in his chosen retreat, he saw that the storm had been spread up, and that it could not be allayed until his race was swept away in the fury of the blast. Life was no longer desirable, and he resolved to die; and again and again did he chant solemnly the death-song in the deep cave, where, like a bear, he had made his lair. He had resolved to die, but he had determined that his last should be a signal blow, a deed of terror and consternation—an evidence that, long lingering in the memory of the pale-faced ones, should tell of the vengeance of the outlawed, injured race, when they visited the recesses of the forest. This one act consummated, and he would meet his foes, and die like his fathers, scorning their tortures, and glorying in beholding the effect of his vengeance. He had found a place presenting an heroic instance of the strength and grandeur of Indian character under violent suffering.

He had often caught a glimpse of Agnes, and he had often felt a little jealous that his enemies should boast a beauty more captivating than the girls of his tribe—he saw that she was the pride of the settlers,—in very truth, the White Fawn of the Valley!

Like lightning he darted from his cave; his hatchet gleamed in the moonbeams, and his terrifying yell pealed, now in protracted and now in deep and broken gutturals, along the sides of the enclosing hills. A moment or two, and all was again hushed; the enterprise was now to trail for blood. His step was silent, but swift as the hound's. On, on he went, o'er hill and dale, through tangled brake and sedgy marsh; not did a muscle flag until he stood before the cabins of Weldon. A moment's reconnoitre, and he knew that the men were away. No guard to female helplessness; no, not even the faithful watch-dog to bay an alarm, or to tell of danger; no gleam of light, to tell that the bolt was falling. The flash and the stroke were simultaneous; the startling whoop and the crash of the yielding door, told them that the unpitying savage was before them. He had paused upon their consternation; they had found him not lost, flight or hiding unthought of. The moment of their first starting, and the wild glare of a fiendish eye was upon them, and the coarse, unfeigned laugh of the savage tortured and terrified them into unceasing astonishment. One shriek was all. Each heart ceased its pulsing, the blood in every vein curdled, and each face grew ashy with fear. The Indian, for a moment, drew up his stalwart form, and grinned with the smile of a demon, resting upon the sufferings he himself had created—the sufferings of unprotected females and children; and then there was a fiendish laugh, and the cries of Kanawhah! Kanawhah! the White Fawn! the White Fawn! and, darting upon Agnes, he bore off the fainting girl in his arms.

Mrs. Weldon and her children, for some moments after, could not speak. They gazed upon each other utterly confounded, scarcely knowing whether the occurrence was a hurrid dream or a dreadful fact; but a moment more and the awful conviction took hold of their hearts, and then. She rushed from the door, and filled the air with loud wailings and ineffectual cries for her stolen, her only daughter, and, as last, overpowered by the intensity of her feelings, sank insensible on the ground.

The fire heard not, or hearing, heeded not her wailings. Hurrying hiswction on, sometimes dragging her, and then, to hasten his flight, throwing her upon his shoulder, he kept on until he reached his retreat, where he threw his burden upon the damp floor of his cave.

The moon threw her soft light in narrow streaks through a few chinks in the ceiling; they fell upon the countenance of the pale sufferer. She gave no signs of life, but she lay in the same position we had thrown her; her lips parted, her eyelids half closed, and her fair, beautiful face, which but an hour before was blooming with health, and lighted up with the merry smile, was soiled with dirt and blood. The imp, equalizing by her side, sat silently, gazing at the unfortunate victim he had brought home. Gratified with the pleasure of seeing her writhe, and rejoicing in her revenge, in the view of her friends, he was implacable foe. He scarcely knew whether she was living or dead. The coldness and dampness of the cavern, however, after some time recalled vitality to the beautiful sufferer. She slowly opened her eyes, and saw the dark figure at her side, but scarcely knew her situation until the glaring eyes and the gruff Indian grunt restored consciousness.

When the morning dawned, she was sufficiently recovered to know too truly the horrors of her situation. As may be supposed, as soon as the intelligence of her abduction could be made known to the men who were abroad, their weary energy was aroused to pursue the depredator. Two or three hours by sun, and the pursuit commenced.

"I tell the tale as 'twas told to me." The Indians marked her surpassing loveliness; and from these she first received the appellation of "The White Fawn," for the exceeding fairness of her complexion, and the airy lightness of her step. Agnes Weldon was also the pride of the settlers; and their descendants have linked her name with the most beautiful legend of their history.

Can any one suppose that a lovely creature at the age of seventeen could live, and yet not be the object of tender thought on the part of many of the stronger sex? There were many of the sons of the settlers who often sought the society of our heroine, and more than one felt anxious to bow before the magic of her beauty. But there was only one who dared to claim this heart as his own.

Agnes never could boast, as some modern belles say they can, that she had twenty offers, and yet rejected them all. She never had but one; and it was not until this period that she even dreamed she loved.

George Benton was four years older than Agnes. With his father's family he had come out to the West at the same time with the Weldons. From childhood he and Agnes had been playmates. Growing in each other's society, they loved before they knew how to describe what love was. To George Benton, from his very boyhood, Agnes had ever seemed the most beautiful and lovely girl of all his acquaintance. Years passed by, and when an hour to have passed tediously, by, if she were at his side, or the companion of his sports. To Agnes, in turn, he had ever been the beau ideal of every thing that was excellent. No other boy possessed nobler sentiments; no other one was half so manly; none knew how to handle a rifle better, or to take better aim; to manage his horse more gracefully—to tell a tale or a joke with better effect than he—no one had a more generous soul or intellectual mind—in short, to do any thing as George Benton did it, was, or begun to be about this period, perfection.

But was this love? They did not think so. To be sure they had a sort of indefinite feeling, that some how or other they could not tell precisely how, their hearts seemed to be growing together. But neither the one nor the other had yet found a name for it. What was it then? It was but destiny, weaving about them the "web inseparate," which was to prove in time how indissolubly their being was united. Their affections were already so wedded, that their souls were e'en "one spirit within two frames—one passion in twin hearts."

How beautiful is love when it thus groweth! Like the vine that slowly and almost imperceptibly putteth forth tendril after tendril, grasping the object of its support, until it so winds itself around, that neither storm nor whirlwind can tear it away! So in first and early love, the offspring of youthful intimacy, heart unconscious of clingeth to heart, tedril knitteth to tendril, until time nor change nor chance, nor the keenest adversity, hath power to part them. Truly hath it been said that such love is the romance of the most romantic and happiest period of life. "Early loves, like the first run of the uncrushed grape, are the sweetest and strongest gushings of the heart."

'Tis true, that as the strength of manhood began to dignify the soul and manners of George, and as Agnes came blushing to the verge of womanhood, both had, at times, felt strangely. This was so, either when present or absent. George, as was natural, was the first to suspect that all was not the bare and simple friendship of youthful minds: he felt that there was a deeper, bolder feeling, and his manners toward her early began to vary, and to assume a tone of tenderness, there was also a singular embarrassment in her presence. Ever and anon

"his blood would ebb and flow,
And his cheek change tempestuously, his heart
Beating knowing of its cause of agony."

But he had begun to feel that all happiness, to him, was lost, unless she was the companion of his life; and in the analysis of this feeling, he found what men call Love. She, more simple, whilst she felt as deeply as he did, and was conscious that her being was wrapt up in his, had not dared to look so deeply into the unfathomable depths of the heart. She knew that a thrill went through her when they met; but here, woman-like, she hitered,—she dared not be sanguine; she was content with that vague feeling; or rather, she trusted not herself to ascertain its elements.

After an interval of uninterrupted quiet, the peace of the settlement was disturbed by the incursions of Indians. After destroying a number of cattle, and firing several barns, the author of these depredators had quietly decamped. The inhabitants, who but a little while before were congratulating themselves on the thought that they were entirely free from the annoyance of the tomahawk and unlooked-for inroad, and they determined to revenge the attack in such a signal manner as to prevent the possibility of its recurrence; in short, they resolved to scour the whole country, and if possible destroy every Indian. Every man that could draw trigger was called out to carry on this war of extermination,—the triumph was to be complete—the last drop of the blood of the already declining race of red men was to be poured out.

For a week the country around had been searched; several skirmishes had taken place; the Indians were every where routed, and many an old and aged veteran and several chiefs fell before the hate of their mortable foes.

Whilst these things were going on, there was one of this hunted people who suspected that extermination was the watchword. But the war-cry of Vantappa did not quake with fear! Secure in his chosen retreat, he saw that the storm had been spread up, and that it could not be allayed until his race was swept away in the fury of the blast. Life was no longer desirable, and he resolved to die; and again and again did he chant solemnly the death-song in the deep cave, where, like a bear, he had made his lair. He had resolved to die, but he had determined that his last should be a signal blow, a deed of terror and consternation—an evidence that, long lingering in the memory of the pale-faced ones, should tell of the vengeance of the outlawed, injured race, when they visited the recesses of the forest. This one act consummated, and he would meet his foes, and die like his fathers, scorning their tortures, and glorying in beholding the effect of his vengeance. He had found a place presenting an heroic instance of the strength and grandeur of Indian character under violent suffering.

He had often caught a glimpse of Agnes, and he had often felt a little jealous that his enemies should boast a beauty more captivating than the girls of his tribe—he saw that she was the pride of the settlers,—in very truth, the White Fawn of the Valley!

Like lightning he darted from his cave; his hatchet gleamed in the moonbeams, and his terrifying yell pealed, now in protracted and now in deep and broken gutturals, along the sides of the enclosing hills. A moment or two, and all was again hushed; the enterprise was now to trail for blood. His step was silent, but swift as the hound's. On, on he went, o'er hill and dale, through tangled brake and sedgy marsh; not did a muscle flag until he stood before the cabins of Weldon. A moment's reconnoitre, and he knew that the men were away. No guard to female helplessness; no, not even the faithful watch-dog to bay an alarm, or to tell of danger; no gleam of light, to tell that the bolt was falling. The flash and the stroke were simultaneous; the startling whoop and the crash of the yielding door, told them that the unpitying savage was before them. He had paused upon their consternation; they had found him not lost, flight or hiding unthought of. The moment of their first starting, and the wild glare of a fiendish eye was upon them, and the coarse, unfeigned laugh of the savage tortured and terrified them into unceasing astonishment. One shriek was all. Each heart ceased its pulsing, the blood in every vein curdled, and each face grew ashy with fear. The Indian, for a moment, drew up his stalwart form, and grinned with the smile of a demon, resting upon the sufferings he himself had created—the sufferings of unprotected females and children; and then there was a fiendish laugh, and the cries of Kanawhah! Kanawhah! the White Fawn! the White Fawn! and, darting upon Agnes, he bore off the fainting girl in his arms.

Mrs. Weldon and her children, for some moments after, could not speak. They gazed upon each other utterly confounded, scarcely knowing whether the occurrence was a hurrid dream or a dreadful fact; but a moment more and the awful conviction took hold of their hearts, and then. She rushed from the door, and filled the air with loud wailings and ineffectual cries for her stolen, her only daughter, and, at last, overpowered by the intensity of her feelings, sank insensible on the ground.

The fire heard not, or hearing, heeded not her wailings. Hurrying hiswction on, sometimes dragging her, and then, to hasten his flight, throwing her upon his shoulder, he kept on until he reached his retreat, where he threw his burden upon the damp floor of his cave.

The moon threw her soft light in narrow streaks through a few chinks in the ceiling; they fell upon the countenance of the pale sufferer. She gave no signs of life, but she lay in the same position we had thrown her; her lips parted, her eyelids half closed, and her fair, beautiful face, which but an hour before was blooming with health, and lighted up with the merry smile, was soiled with dirt and blood. The imp, equalizing by her side, sat silently, gazing at the unfortunate victim he had brought home. Gratified with the pleasure of seeing her writhe, and rejoicing in her revenge, in the view of her friends, he was implacable foe. He scarcely knew whether she was living or dead. The coldness and dampness of the cavern, however, after some time recalled vitality to the beautiful sufferer. She slowly opened her eyes, and saw the dark figure at her side, but scarcely knew her situation until the glaring eyes and the gruff Indian grunt restored consciousness.

When the morning dawned, she was sufficiently recovered to know too truly the horrors of her situation. As may be supposed, as soon as the intelligence of her abduction could be made known to the men who were abroad, their weary energy was aroused to pursue the depredator. Two or three hours by sun, and the pursuit commenced.

The Indian, suspecting this would be the case, hastened to execute his purposes.

When reason and consciousness had, with the light of day, returned to Agnes, she looked around her. The monster was sitting in a remote corner of the cave. He did not notice her gaze; his chin was resting upon his hands, his eyes were fixed upon the ground, and deep and bitter thought seemed to chain him in portentous silence. It was the quiet of the soul, such as holds possession of it, while resolving on desperate and malicious projects—the calm which often precedes the angry surging of the human passions. She made a movement as if to rise; he started wildly from his reverie, and threw a glance at her which would have made a stouter heart quail; but his look relaxed its sternness, and approaching her, said, "does the White Fawn hope for pity? Once Vantappa knew what it was to pity; once, Vantappa was kind to all, and grew fierce only when his tribe went to battle; but the white man has torn all softness from his heart, and now he cannot pity even the White Fawn! Once, Vantappa would have slain his own men, had they raised the hatchet against a woman; but now he relents not, for the white man big in each other's society, they loved before they knew how to describe what love was. To George Benton, from his very boyhood, Agnes had ever seemed the most beautiful and lovely girl of all his acquaintance. Years passed by, and when an hour to have passed tediously, by, if she were at his side, or the companion of his sports. To Agnes, in turn, he had ever been the beau ideal of every thing that was excellent. No other boy possessed nobler sentiments; no other one was half so manly; none knew how to handle a rifle better, or to take better aim; to manage his horse more gracefully—to tell a tale or a joke with better effect than he—no one had a more generous soul or intellectual mind—in short, to do any thing as George Benton did it, was, or begun to be about this period, perfection.

But was this love? They did not think so. To be sure they had a sort of indefinite feeling, that some how or other they could not tell precisely how, their hearts seemed to be growing together. But neither the one nor the other had yet found a name for it. What was it then? It was but destiny, weaving about them the "web inseparate," which was to prove in time how indissolubly their being was united. Their affections were already so wedded, that their souls were e'en "one spirit within two frames—one passion in twin hearts."

How beautiful is love when it thus groweth! Like the vine that slowly and almost imperceptibly putteth forth tendril after tendril, grasping the object of its support, until it so winds itself around, that neither storm nor whirlwind can tear it away! So in first and early love, the offspring of youthful intimacy, heart unconscious of clingeth to heart, tedril knitteth to tendril, until time nor change nor chance, nor the keenest adversity, hath power to part them. Truly hath it been said that such love is the romance of the most romantic and happiest period of life. "Early loves, like the first run of the uncrushed grape, are the sweetest and strongest gushings of the heart."

'Tis true, that as the strength of manhood began to dignify the soul and manners of George, and as Agnes came blushing to the verge of womanhood, both had, at times, felt strangely. This was so, either when present or absent. George, as was natural, was the first to suspect that all was not the bare and simple friendship of youthful minds: he felt that there was a deeper, bolder feeling, and his manners toward her early began to vary, and to assume a tone of tenderness, there was also a singular embarrassment in her presence. Ever and anon

"his blood would ebb and flow,
And his cheek change tempestuously, his heart
Beating knowing of its cause of agony."

But he had begun to feel that all happiness, to him, was lost, unless she was the companion of his life; and in the analysis of this feeling, he found what men call Love. She, more simple, whilst she felt as deeply as he did, and was conscious that her being was wrapt up in his, had not dared to look so deeply into the unfathomable depths of the heart. She knew that a thrill went through her when they met; but here, woman-like, she hitered,—she dared not be sanguine; she was content with that vague feeling; or rather, she trusted not herself to ascertain its elements.

After an interval of uninterrupted quiet, the peace of the settlement was disturbed by the incursions of Indians. After destroying a number of cattle, and firing several barns, the author of these depredators had quietly decamped. The inhabitants, who but a little while before were congratulating themselves on the thought that they were entirely free from the annoyance of the tomahawk and unlooked-for inroad, and they determined to revenge the attack in such a signal manner as to prevent the possibility of its recurrence; in short, they resolved to scour the whole country, and if possible destroy every Indian. Every man that could draw trigger was called out to carry on this war of extermination,—the triumph was to be complete—the last drop of the blood of the already declining race of red men was to be poured out.

For a week the country around had been searched; several skirmishes had taken place; the Indians were every where routed, and many an old and aged veteran and several chiefs fell before the hate of their mortable foes.

Whilst these things were going on, there was one of this hunted people who suspected that extermination was the watchword. But the war-cry of Vantappa did not quake with fear! Secure in his chosen retreat, he saw that the storm had been spread up, and that it could not be allayed until his race was swept away in the fury of the blast. Life was no longer desirable, and he resolved to die; and again and again did he chant solemnly the death-song in the deep cave, where, like a bear, he had made his lair. He had resolved to die, but he had determined that his last should be a signal blow, a deed of terror and consternation—an evidence that, long lingering in the memory of the pale-faced ones, should tell of the vengeance of the outlawed, injured race, when they visited the recesses of the forest. This one act consummated, and he would meet his foes, and die like his fathers, scorning their tortures, and glorying in beholding the effect of his vengeance. He had found a place presenting an heroic instance of the strength and grandeur of Indian character under violent suffering.

He had often caught a glimpse of Agnes, and he had often felt a little jealous that his enemies should boast a beauty more captivating than the girls of his tribe—he saw that she was the pride of the settlers,—in very truth, the White Fawn of the Valley!

Like lightning he darted from his cave; his hatchet gleamed in the moonbeams, and his terrifying yell pealed, now in protracted and now in deep and broken gutturals, along the sides of the enclosing hills. A moment or two, and all was again hushed; the enterprise was now to trail for blood. His step was silent, but swift as the hound's. On, on he went, o'er hill and dale, through tangled brake and sedgy marsh; not did a muscle flag until he stood before the cabins of Weldon. A moment's reconnoitre, and he knew that the men were away. No guard to female helplessness; no, not even the faithful watch-dog to bay an alarm, or to tell of danger; no gleam of light, to tell that the bolt was falling. The flash and the stroke were simultaneous; the startling whoop and the crash of the yielding door, told them that the unpitying savage was before them. He had paused upon their consternation; they had found him not lost, flight or hiding unthought of. The moment of their first starting, and the wild glare of a fiendish eye was upon them, and the coarse, unfeigned laugh of the savage tortured and terrified them into unceasing astonishment. One shriek was all. Each heart ceased its pulsing, the blood in every vein curdled, and each face grew ashy with fear. The Indian, for a moment, drew up his stalwart form, and grinned with the smile of a demon, resting upon the sufferings he himself had created—the sufferings of unprotected females and children; and then there was a fiendish laugh, and the cries of Kanawhah! Kanawhah! the White Fawn! the White Fawn! and, darting upon Agnes, he bore off the fainting girl in his arms.

Mrs. Weldon and her children, for some moments after, could not speak. They gazed upon each other utterly confounded, scarcely knowing whether the occurrence was a hurrid dream or a dreadful fact; but a moment more and the awful conviction took hold of their hearts, and then. She rushed from the door, and filled the air with loud wailings and ineffectual cries for her stolen, her only daughter, and, at last, overpowered by the intensity of her feelings, sank insensible on the ground.

The fire heard not, or hearing, heeded not her wailings. Hurrying hiswction on, sometimes dragging her, and then, to hasten his flight, throwing her upon his shoulder, he kept on until he reached his retreat, where he threw his burden upon the damp floor of his cave.

The moon threw her soft light in narrow streaks through a few chinks in the ceiling; they fell upon the countenance of the pale sufferer. She gave no signs of life, but she lay in the same position we had thrown her; her lips parted, her eyelids half closed, and her fair, beautiful face, which but an hour before was blooming with health, and lighted up with the merry smile, was soiled with dirt and blood. The imp, equalizing by her side, sat silently, gazing at the unfortunate victim he had brought home. Gratified with the pleasure of seeing her writhe, and rejoicing in her revenge, in the view of her friends, he was implacable foe. He scarcely knew whether she was living or dead. The coldness and dampness of the cavern, however, after some time recalled vitality to the beautiful sufferer. She slowly opened her eyes, and saw the dark figure at her side, but scarcely knew her situation until the glaring eyes and the gruff Indian grunt restored consciousness.

When the morning dawned, she was sufficiently recovered to know too truly the horrors of her situation. As may be supposed, as soon as the intelligence of her abduction could be made known to the men who were abroad, their weary energy was aroused to pursue the depredator. Two or three hours by sun, and the pursuit commenced.

F. P. Willis.

The Dublin University then humorously discoverseth on the author of "Pencillings by the Way."

Of all the lions that caprice and the whimsical absurdity of a second-rate set in fashion ever courted and entertained, never had any one less pretensions to the civility he received than the author of "Pencillings by the Way"—poor in thought, still poorer in expression, without a spark of wit, without a gleam of imagination—a fourth-rate looking man, and a fifth-rate talker, he continued to receive the homage we were wont to bestow upon a Scott, and even charity extended to a Dickens. His writings the very slip-slop of "commerage," the tittle-tattle of a Sunday paper, dressed up in the cant of Kentucky; the very titles, the contemptible affectation of unredeemed twaddle, "Pencillings by the Way!" "Letters from under a bridge!" Good Lack! how the latter name is suggestive of eavesdropping and listening; and how involuntarily we call to mind those chance expressions of his partners in the dance, that we, seated at the table, faithfully recorded for the edification of the freeborn Americans, who, while they ridicule our institutions, endeavor to pantomime our manners.

For many years past a number of persons have driven a thriving trade in a singular branch of commerce, no less than buying up cast court dresses and second-hand uniforms for exportation to the colonies. Of late, however, it is said, are for presents of figuring in the tattered and tarnished fragments of former greatness, than of wearing the less gaudy, but more useful garb, befitting their condition. So it would seem our trans-Atlantic friends prefer imitating through their agents, for that purpose, the abandoned finery of courtly gossip, to the more useful but less pretentious apparel of common-place information. Mr. Willis was invaluable for this purpose; he held up to the friends every thing that he heard, and he heard every thing that he could; and, like mercy, he enjoyed a duplicate of blessings—for while he was delighted in by his own countrymen, he was dined by ours. He scattered his autographs, as Fergus O'Connor did franks; he smiled; he ogled; he read his own poetry, and went the whole lion with all his might; and yet, in the midst of this, a rival starts up equally desirous of court secrets, and fifty times as enterprising in their search; he risks his liberty, perhaps his life, in the pursuit, and what is his reward? I need only tell you his name, and you are answered—I mean the boy Jones; not under a bridge, but under a sofa; not in Almacks, obtaining it at second-hand, but in Buckingham palace—into the very apartment of the Queen—the adventurous youth has dared to insinuate himself. No lady, however, sends her album to him for some memento of his genius. His temple is not defrauded of its curls to grace a locket or a medallion; and his reward, instead of a supper at Lady Blessington's, is a voyage to Swan River. For my part, I prefer the boy Jones! I like his singleness of purpose: I admire his steady perseverance; still, however, he had the misfortune to be born in England—his father lived near Wapping, and he was ineligible for a lion.

To what other reason than his English growth can be attributed the different treatment he has experienced at the hands of the world. The similarity between the two characters is most striking. Willis had a craving appetite for court gossip, and the tittle-tattle of a palace: so had the boy Jones. Willis established himself as a listener in society; so did the boy Jones. Willis obtrudes himself into places, and among people where he had no possible pretension to be seen; so did the boy Jones. Willis wrote letters from under a bridge; the boy Jones cut mutton chops under a sofa.

Ladies Department.

Was the Buried Dead!

Tears wept wise! then were good! then were loved!
With thy name all my hopes were entwined.
And each day but more tenderly proved.
How my life in thy life was enshrined!
But the light has gone out! Thine eyes were
And those odorous breathings are shed,
And while to awake thee I try.
They rudely exclaim, thou art dead!

Then were prized as the one precious gem.
And my heart was the casket for thee!
Yet now I am glorious in thee.
And they bear my rich treasure from me;
They wait not for coffin nor shroud,
They heed not the tears that I shed.
But they hustle thee off with the crowd.
And cast thee in darkness to bed.

Then were good! yet no requiem not bell
Denotes the sad passage of worth.
And no shuddering mourner may tell
How they flung thee like filth in the earth!
Death with hatters hath heaped thee around.
Corruption has pilfered thy charms.
They have piled up that dread cavern's bound,
And now must I pass clean art dead!

Coldest thou wake in that pestilent grave
To know where thou lie'st left to decay.
To struggle, to battle, to rave,
Though the dead see thee grapest thy way.
Thou wouldst tear out thine heart in affright!
Thy wisdom, thine intellect fled.
Coldest thou creep through that death-alone to light.
Affection would wish thou wert dead!

Oh death, that but now was the theme
Of mine anguish and sorrow! Rose Bloomer.
To such horrors as these doth but seem
A subject for tendrest prayer.
Thou art gone!—thou art risen on high.
To the throne of the Father thou'rt sped
Thou'rt above the dominion of night.
Would to God I were sure thou wert dead!

Female Exercise.

The subject ass